Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it has been suggested to me by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who objected to the former request for unanimous consent, that in a modified form it might be acceptable. I imagine that the Senate is about ready to vote; and I ask unanimous consent, in any event, that from now on speeches be limited to 15 minutes, and that no

Senator be allowed to speak more than one time—simply on this amendment, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McLEAN in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, my information is that there is but one other Senator on this side who desires to speak, and that is the Senator from Wisconsin, and after an arrangement and understanding that he was to speak I would not want to agree to that unanimous-consent request.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator refer to this Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WATSON. No; I refer to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I have been informed that he is the one Senator upon this side who desires to speak. If that be true, he having told me that he did not wish to speak at great length——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Wisconsin is here.

Mr. WATSON. He is here and he can speak for himself, and he has said that he did not desire to speak at great length. Of course, that is up to him to decide, but until he shall decide, personally I do not feel at liberty to agree to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, after listening to the debate this afternoon, I do not feel that I can let the inference go out to the country that the people of Irish descent are disloyal. I know that I can speak for those in my own State against any proposition of that kind, for I know how loyal they have been right through this war, and I know that American history will show how the blood of people of Irish descent has been shed in every cause for which America fought. I resent, Mr. President, any such suggestion, and would speak further on the subject if it were not for the fact that I do not wish to delay a vote on this very important amendment.

Mr. FALL and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have no intention of making a speech. I have not made a speech upon the Shantung proposition. I am a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and voted to report what is known as the Shantung amendment from that committee.

When the peace conference met, Mr. President, it was, among other things, to deal with the possessions of Germany in Europe outside of the boundaries fixed by the five principal allied and associated powers. It was then to deal with the overseas possessions of Germany—that is, German possessions out of Europe.

In dealing with the European possessions of Germany, article 118 of the present treaty was adopted. By the terms of that article Germany simply renounces any claim upon any territory outside of the geographic limits fixed by the treaty.

In renouncing her overseas possessions Germany in terms renounces the overseas possessions in favor of the five principal allied and associated powers. The determination of the powers was to deprive Germany of her possessions. The general disposition of those possessions in Europe was left, by the terms of the treaty, to treaties that thereafter were to be made. The disposition of the overseas possessions of Germany under the terms of the treaty was left to the disposition which might be made of such possessions by the five principal allied and associated powers.

Article 23 of the covenant of the league of nations does, in a conversational way, refer to probable future disposition or government of such overseas possessions. The object, then, of the representatives of the great powers seated at the peace table was attained when Germany made the renunciation. The possessions were thereafter to be dealt with.

When it came to the disposition of Shantung, however, there were two claimants, each of whom claimed that the principal allied and associated powers should force Germany to renounce specifically in its favor the Shantung possession.

The question of the disposition of Fiume was up for consideration. The President of the United States declined to join the commissioners or representatives of the other powers in the disposition of Fiume, and appealed to the Italian people over the heads of Orlando and Sonino. Those representatives of Italy at once left the peace conference. Japan up to that time had not taken part among the five powers. She was not one of the principal representatives who were arranging the terms of the peace treaty. She had taken part, or did take part thereafter, as one of the ten, but had not taken part as one of the five. When Italy's representatives walked out because of the action of the President of the United States it is well understood that pressure was immediately brought to bear upon Mr. Wilson to secure the attendance of Japan for the purpose of enabling them finally to constitute their league, and as Japan walked into the door, she walked into the conference chamber with the word "Shantung" upon her lips. Shantung was the price of the entrance of Japan, and it was paid.

Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, charged by the Senate with the duty of considering the treaty, I had, first, by my vote, to decide whether the overseas possessions of Germany should be taken from her. I did not hesitate for a moment, of course, in determining that she should be deprived of her overseas possessions; and under the general terms of the treaty, if no special disposition of any of them was made in the treaty itself, the overseas possessions become the property of the five allied and associated powers, and under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Insular cases and the Four Diamond cases we took a one-fifth undivided interest in those properties.

Having decided, first, in my own mind, that the action of the peace commission or the delegates in depriving Germany of her overseas possessions should be sustained, it then became necessary for me to decide, as a representative of a coordinate branch of the Government engaged in treaty making, as to whether Shantung should be left with the other overseas possessions of Germany in the hands of the five allied and associated powers or should be given specifically to any other power without awaiting the further treaty provided under article 119.

This being the case, I looked at the proposition from the standpoint of what should be done with it; whether we, having a one-fifth interest, should dispose of it to any particular power hereafter or at the present time. Under the terms of the treaty I conceived it my duty to cast my vote for the disposition of it at this time, and it became necessary for me to determine whether, in so doing, we should approve the action of the President of the United States in deeding it to Japan. In my judgment it belongs to China, and I voted to return it to its owner, and I shall sustain that vote by my vote upon the pending amendments in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator had voted to return Shantung to its owner, he would have voted to return it to Germany, because it happened that Germany was the owner when this war began. So all that labored argument falls to the ground.

Mr. President, I want to put into the RECORD a letter addressed to Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE, United States Senate, being a copy of a letter sent October 8, 1919, by the League to Enforce Peace, to the Senator from Connecticut, with various names signed. Before I insert it I will say that I submitted it to the Senator from Connecticut. There is nothing personal in it. It is a mere matter of a difference of opinion about the pending question.

(Signed) LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE,
WILLIAM H. SHORT, Secretary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In addition to that, Mr. President, I desire to insert an article entitled, "Houston Replies to BORAH. Declares Charges are 'False Both in Fact and Implication.'" I have not had an opportunity to see the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], but there are three lines that I think ought to be stricken out, because they might be regarded as personal, and I have stricken them out.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The New York Times, Oct. 11, 1919.]

HOUSTON REPLIES TO BORAH—DECLARES CHARGES ARE "FALSE BOTH IN FACT AND IMPLICATION."

Herbert S. Houston, national treasurer of the League to Enforce Peace, issued the following statement last night in reply to Senator BORAH'S attack on the league in the Senate on Thursday:

"Senator BORAH again places the League to Enforce Peace in his debt by advertising our necessities. The last time he attacked the league in the Senate he brought to our treasury several thousand dollars from friends of whom we had never heard.

* * * * * * *

"While he was fulminating on the floor of the Senate against the league of which the recent Republican President, Mr. Taft, is the head, three other leading Republican members of our executive committee, President Lowell, of Harvard, Mr. Oscar S. Straus, and Mr. Hamilton Holt were in open and friendly conference with Senator LODGE. A few blocks away, in the District National Bank Building, was our sinister and corrupting press bureau, in charge of one of the most distinguished journalists in the United States, Dr. Talcott Williams, long Dean of the Pulitzer School of Journalism at Columbia, and a lifelong Republican.

"Let Senator BORAH ask any Washington correspondent, or all of them, if Dr. Williams, or his associate, Mr. Rickey, has ever offered anything for publication that infringed in the slightest degree on the highest ethics of their profession.

"One thing the Senator said was true—that the League to Enforce Peace was spending a good deal of money. It is spending it for the distribution of millions of pamphlets by Mr. Taft, Herbert Hoover, Samuel Gompers, and scores of other patriotic leaders of American thought who believe that this country will fail in its plain duty unless it joins the league of nations.

"As to the names of the 10,000 subscribers who have made possible this broad campaign of popular education, they are available for Senator BORAH the very moment he will agree to have them published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This is a standing offer we have had before the Senator for three months."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall take only a few minutes of the time of the Senate in discussing this amendment. The question is so simple and so plain that no one can misunderstand it. Under articles 156, 157, and 158 of the treaty Germany is compelled to agree to renounce to Japan all right, title, and interest which she theretofore had in the Province of Shantung, China, and to do those things necessary to make such transfer of interest. The Province of Shantung consists of a territory comprising nearly 60,000 square miles—a trifle larger than England—and has a population of nearly 40,000,000 people.

The interest and rights Germany had in this Province were acquired by the treaty of 1898, which Germany forced upon China, and consisted of certain rights in the Bay of Kiaochow in the nature of sovereign rights and mining and railroad rights in the entire Province. All such rights, however, were in the nature of a mere lease for a term of years. Up to the time in 1914, early in the war, when Germany was driven out of the Province by Japan, the Germans had strictly lived up to the terms of the treaty, and had not attempted to overrun or occupy the whole Province. As soon as Japan wrested it from China, however, she at once took steps to make it as difficult as possible to dispossess her.

Dr. John Ferguson, legal adviser to the President of the Chinese Republic, in an address in New York City, Sunday, October 12 last, as reported in the papers of the following day, said:

Japan has been doing everything to make it difficult to dispossess it. The railroads have been overrun with Japanese employees, and there are now between fifty and one hundred thousand Japanese in the Province, whereas prior to 1914 the total German population, including the garrison, was only 3,000.

Now, it is in this situation that the treaty proposes to compel Germany to turn over to Japan against China's objections and protests the rights once held by Germany in the Province, while the committee amendment provides in effect that they shall remain with China.

That is the issue to be determined and settled by our vote this afternoon.

I say remain with China, because there is where those rights unquestionably are now. When China entered the war against Germany, of course Germany's rights and property interests in China reverted to China. But that isn't all. When Japan made her demands upon Germany in 1914 preceding her declaration of war against Germany, it was simply that the German rights in the Province should be surrendered with a view to their return to China. So that when in 1914 Japan drove the Germans out of this territory she did not succeed and did not pretend to succeed to the German rights. Japan and China were not at war. Japan could only succeed to the German rights with the consent of China after Germany had been evicted. Germany was out of possession, but her rights continued, though in abeyance, under the treaty of 1898 until China and Germany became involved in war with each other in 1917, when, of course, German rights, interests, and property in China lawfully became the property of China.

The question simply is, therefore, whether or not we shall become a party to a gigantic theft of territory and valuable rights from China, a sister Republic, an ally in the late war, for the benefit of the most despotic Government on earth.

It is fundamental in the law of contracts, whether between individuals or nations, that no one has power to convey rights which do not belong to him.

We have not a scintilla of right or title to anything in the Province of Shantung.

If so, where did we acquire it? If not, how can we convey it or how can we join in a conveyance? Neither for that matter has Germany or any of the other powers joining in this treaty.

When we assume to join in conveying or in compelling Germany to go through the form of conveying the territory and rights mentioned in the Province of Shantung to Japan it only means that we have the power in conjunction with our late Allies or associates in the war to take by force that which belongs to China and transfer it to Japan, not that we or they have any title which we, under any law recognized in civilized society, can convey to anybody.

If China had the power to resist this rape we would never think of making the assault upon her. If China had the power to resist the ravishment of her title to her territory we would never think of joining with the Allies in committing this infamous crime.

If we become a party to this treaty provision our conduct is no better than that of the armed highwayman who holds up an unarmed and defenseless traveler, robs him of his purse, and then passes it to a confederate.

Volumes have been written about the Shantung provision of this treaty and weeks have been spent in debating it. And out of all the discussion one fact emerges, admitted and recognized by everybody: We have nothing in the Province of Shantung to convey to anyone. If we have, where did we get our title to it? We do not own or have an interest in a foot of territory there. We have not any sort of title, right, or interest in any mine or any railroad or in anything else there. Neither has Germany any shadow of interest in anything in the Province. When we join in compelling Germany to put on record a conveyance of rights in Shantung we are in effect declaring that Germany has some interest there which she can convey. We know that is false. When we join in directing her to make that conveyance to Japan we are guilty of a double deception. We pretend, first, that she has something to convey, and we know that she has not. We assert, second, that whatever interest she has to convey it is right and lawful that she should convey it to Japan. That also known to be absolutely false.

I am utterly unable to follow the reasoning of the distinguished Senators here who admit the criminal nature of the act to which we become a party by rejecting this amendment and signing the treaty, but who say nevertheless that it has gone so far we can accomplish nothing by refusing to become a party to the crime.

There I take issue with them. The crime has not been fully consummated. I believe that if the United States would withdraw at this point, the other parties would never venture to consummate the crime against China. But if they should go forward in this nefarious proceeding, that is no reason why we should join with them in it.

There is a fundamental fallacy which underlies all the reasoning of the Senators who say that it is too late for us to accomplish anything now. Their argument is that the treaty is already in effect; that whether the conveyance by Germany to Japan is effective now or not, it will be so when Japan formally ratifies the treaty, which will be before the Senate passes upon it—in other words, that the conveyance from Germany to Japan is or will be effective and we can not prevent it.

Now, the fundamental error, as I believe, in that reasoning lies in the assumption that Germany has something to convey to Japan in the Province of Shantung.

Suppose that Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan should make a treaty with Germany, or suppose they had written into this treaty a provision that Germany should make a bill of sale of all Germany's property in this country which we took over properly and lawfully under international law as soon as we became involved in war with Germany, does anyone suppose that that bill of sale would be worth the paper it was written upon? It would be a fraud upon its face. It would convey nothing. It would be of no more value than blank paper. That is precisely the situation concerning the conveyance or cession which Germany, under compulsion from the Allies, is going to make to Japan of China's rights in Shantung.

The whole trouble with the reasoning of the Senators is that they fail to look through the form of the transaction to the substance of it. We might just as well leave Germany out of it, so far as the real substance of the transaction is concerned. We might just as well pretend that France or Great Britain or some other country succeeded to Germany's rights in Shantung, and that that country should make the conveyance to Japan.

As I have said, and say again, in 1914 Germany was driven out of every foot of this territory. It had possession or control of absolutely nothing there. This was done by Japan in war with Germany, but as a friendly act to China, declared to be for the purpose of restoring to China the rights which everyone knew Germany forced her to yield up in the treaty of 1898.

It is not pretended that Japan acquired by her action the German rights, for if that were the pretense there would be no occasion to write into this treaty the provision that Germany shall make conveyance to Japan.

Then, in 1917, the latent rights to the territory which may have still remained in Germany were absolutely wiped out when Germany and China became involved in war with each other. So that I say Germany from that time forth had no more rights to convey in the Province of Shantung than we or any other country had.

Therefore, when gentlemen say that the crime has already been consummated because Germany's conveyance under this treaty has been or soon will be made, they miss the whole point involved. This cession from Germany to Japan gives legal title to nothing, because Germany has no title to it. The act which this treaty requires of Germany is a barren act, an empty form. There is no real difference so far as the title of China to her property is concerned after Germany has made this conveyance than before she made it. The conveyance does not effect a change of title. It does not affect the ownership, because Germany has nothing to convey. Moreover, the lease, which was all Germany ever had secured from China under the treaty of 1898, provides that Germany's interest can not be assigned. (See Art. V, treaty of 1898.)

The real substance of this transaction is the agreement between Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan to carve out of China a large area and valuable rights and turn them over to Japan. That is the real thing that is being done. That is the crime that is about to be consummated, and that is the crime I say the United States can prevent by refusing to be made a party to it.

This partition of China simply rests upon force, and it involves a robbery so barefaced that I do not believe the nations involved will dare go through with it if the United States brands the transaction for what it really is and refuses to become a party to it.

By rejecting this provision of the treaty and adopting this amendment we will halt the nations engaged in this assault upon China's sovereignty and territorial integrity and cause them to reconsider their action; while it is certain that if we ratify this treaty with this provision in it, there will be no possible reason for the other nations ever to reconsider their action, and, more than that, we will ourselves have become a party to the very crime we so severely condemn.

Ah! but Senators say, we will frame a reservation by which we will condemn this wrong and thereby keep our own hands clean of this infamy. A reservation will either amount to an amendment or it will amount to nothing—except to record a confession of our own guilt.

The reservation which I have heard suggested here is to the effect that a statement will be made in the resolution ratifying the treaty that the United States will not assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, relating to Shantung, and will preserve full liberty of action respecting that matter. Now, I submit to the Senators whether it would not be far better to vote for the committee amendment, which is perfectly clear, than to attempt to confuse the treaty with any such provision as that suggested.

A treaty between nations like a contract between individuals requires a meeting of the minds upon all the propositions involved in the contract, and if there is not such a meeting of minds there is no contract between individuals and there is no treaty between nations. Suppose A and B are about to enter into a contract. The proposed contract is drawn up. A signs it. It is presented to B for his signature. He signs it but before doing so adds a clause to it saying that "as to provisions 1, 2, and 3"—possibly the most important provisions in the contract—"I am not bound, and shall preserve full liberty of action respecting those matters." Does anyone pretend that that would be a contract? Does anyone pretend that if allowed to rest in that form its effect would be other than to cause controversy between the parties to it? And yet, sir, I do not see wherein the action of the "mild" reservationists, so called in the Senate, differs from the action I have supposed in the case of individual parties to a private contract.

I believe, sir, that it is far better to support the committee amendment which leaves no doubt as to the position of the United States, and, whether we prevent this wrong or not, such action would show that we have done everything in our power to prevent it, and we can never be accused in any way of condoning or being a party to it.

Mr. President, no one can know, but I believe, that if we adopt the pending amendment the allied powers will be forced to halt in their course; they will be forced to reconsider their action and accept the treaty as amended.

A righteous declaration made here to-day will thrill the lovers of liberty in every capital on the face of the earth.

It will loosen the tongues of mankind in one universal acclaim of approval.

Even the allied powers can not brave the verdict of the world when once it is made articulate.

The Imperial Government of Japan is not yet ready to challenge the white civilization.

Adopt this amendment and the moral power of that act alone will compel Great Britain, France, and Italy to reconsider ratification of this treaty.

The United States is the very corner stone of this peace structure as it has been planned.

Adopt this amendment and the crime of Shantung will never be consummated.

And, sir, that crime is such an odious thing that it must be literally effaced from any instrument to which this Government puts its hand and seal.

There is no middle course.

These reservation Senators are on record denouncing the act as the "rape of China." Are they prepared to say to Japan and to the consenting allies, "You may consummate this unspeakable crime, but it must be with our disapproval. We know your brutal design; you have a notorious record which proclaims your fell purpose; but you will please take notice now that we denounce this infamy as 'highly improper.'"

That, sir, does not represent the moral sense of the American people on the issue raised by this amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, hoping to get an immediate vote on the pending amendment, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of no quorum having been made, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

In accordance with the Chair's construction of the unanimous-consent agreement, if there is no further discussion, the Senate will proceed to vote upon the committee amendments to section VIII, articles 156, 157, and 158, embracing six amendments, commonly known as the Shantung amendments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when Mr. MARTIN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is detained on account of illness. His pair has been announced. If he were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. He would vote, I understand, "nay" on these textual amendments. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DIAL (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). My colleague the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained on account of illness in his family. So the amendments were rejected.

Mr. LODGE. I give notice that at the proper time, after the committee amendments are disposed of, I shall move to strike the Shantung section from the treaty. I ask that the reading of the treaty be continued.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the treaty, at the top of page 210, and read as follows:

"Section II.

" NAVAL CLAUSES.

"Article 181.

"After the expiration of a period of two months from the coming into force of the present Treaty the German naval forces in commission must not exceed:

" 6 battleships of the Deutschland or Lothringen type,

" 6 light cruisers,

" 12 destroyers,

" 12 torpedo boats, or an equal number of ships constructed to replace them as provided in Article 190.

" No submarines are to be included.

"All other warships, except where there is provision to the contrary in the present Treaty, must be placed in reserve or devoted to commercial purposes.

"Article 182.

" Until the completion of the minesweeping prescribed by Article 193 Germany will keep in commission such number of minesweeping vessels as may be fixed by the Governments of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

"Article 183.

"After the expiration of a period of two months from the coming into force of the present Treaty the total personnel of the German Navy, including the manning of the fleet, coast defences, signal stations, administration and other land services, must not exceed fifteen thousand, including officers and men of all grades and corps.

" The total strength of officers and warrant officers must not exceed fifteen hundred.

" Within two months from the coming into force of the present Treaty the personnel in excess of the above strength shall be demobilized.

" No naval or military corps or reserve force in connection with the Navy may be organised in Germany without being included in the above strength.

"Article 184.

" From the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty all the German surface warships which are not in German ports cease to belong to Germany, who renounces all rights over them.

" Vessels which, in compliance with the Armistice of November 11, 1918, are now interned in the ports of the Allied and Associated Powers are declared to be finally surrendered.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the Arkansas Methodist urging the ratification of the treaty.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Arkansas Methodist, Oct. 2, 1919.]

"ACT! ACT! ACT!

"Shall last November's peans and jubilation be for naught? Russia is a red riot. Roumania and her neighbors still fight. Turkish outrages yet persist. Italy is almost in the throes of revolution. France fumes and frets. Great Britain's Irish and labor troubles threaten stable government. Unrest in India and Eypt menace the British Empire. The United States seethes with artificially induced discontent. The powers that fiercely fronted the Teutonic terror are crumbling to pieces like a wall of sand.

"Germany has her troubles, but Germany, less wasted than any other European power, Germany rapidly coalescing and recuperating, may by a sudden turn reinstate the Hohenzollerns, and, thirsting for revenge, mobilize her forces and spring, tiger-like, upon her foolish foes. If Germany could direct the disintegrating and dissolving forces of her former enemies, she could not work a more pleasing program.

"Again and again in history the vanquished have recuperated and reorganized while the victors quarreled or lolled at ease, and at the strategic moment the conquered have become conquerors. Shall history repeat its tragedies on a larger scale?

"If well-ordered and stable governments are not maintained among the Entente nations, in six months one of two things may easily happen: (1) The German Imperial Government may be restored and her disorganized enemies brought to their knees; or (2) the forces of Socialism and Bolshevism may, through industrial warfare, grasp temporary authority in all the nations.

"The proposed peace treaty involving the league of nations is a very human document. It is far from perfection. But who of all its critics could in the contending currents have constructed a better pact? It or its equivalent alone to-day can as a political instrumentality still the tempest and restore order. Grant that Woodrow Wilson was not tactful in dealing with the Republicans or in handling the Senate. Recognize, if you will, his obsession of self-sufficiency. Imagine, if necessary, that he has further presidential aspirations. None of these things change the perilous situation or offer any hope of a better document. In advocating the ratification of the treaty without amendment, whether he is a good man or a bad man, a statesman or a demagogue, a wise man or a fool, he is advocating the only political expedient which promises immediate relief from the menace of Teutonic domination or world revolution.

"When men are surrounded by bloodthirsty savages intent upon their destruction, they do not usually debate technicalities of organization nor the honor which might come to one of their number if he should lead them to victory.

"Those who pose as supreme Americans and argue that safety first for their own America is the only patriotism are as foolish as the householder who by sprinkling his own roof in the midst of a general conflagration fails to cooperate with those who must have his aid to put out the surrounding fire. He who seeks only his own safety will perish, and all his goods with him. He who helps his imperiled neighbors may save himself in saving them. America can not isolate herself. She is in the world conflagration, and walls a thousand cubits high can not withstand the fierce fire. America must help extinguish the whole fire or burn with the helpless of earth.

"We do not prophesy; but we point out imminent possibilities. Can the Senate of the United States afford to quibble over imaginary dangers when world catastrophe momentarily threatens? Can any Senator, whether Democrat or Republican, for personal or party profit, dare to face humanity if the impending calamity overwhelms our distracted world?

"Can Congress as a whole stand acquitted at the bar of God if, by paltering and procrastinating, they fail to provide the necessary laws and tribunals to control the revolutionary forces of America which, foolishly or criminally agitating, seek to destroy our civilization? No Congress ever had such responsibility. If there are wise and good and courageous men in our Federal Legislature, the tremendous issues of the day challenge them to constructive action. We are not standing still, waiting for the Senate to ratify and Congress to legislate; we are rushing toward the very verge of a chasm and are barely holding back the mad forces which would plunge us headlong to the bottom. It is time to throw selfish caution to the winds and become patriots. The next 90 days are more momentous than the corresponding period of last year, because America, organized and determined, even temporarily defeated, would never have given up the fight, while now, lacking sane leadership, we are little better than a seething mob.

"Senators, Congressmen, it is not the mute pyramids of the past that look down upon you, but helpless humanity looks up through blood and tears and begs you to do your duty.

"O Jehovah, God of Hosts and God of the weak, give vision and courage and power to those upon whom the safety of Thy children rests."

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 12) authorizing the Clerk of the House, in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 8624) known as the food-control bill, to make certain corrections, which was, in line 8 of the second paragraph of section 106 of the bill as agreed upon in conference, to strike out the oblique line and the word "or" thereafter.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, October 17, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 16, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, we would approach Thee in the spirit of Him who spake as never man spake, who lived as never man lived, who died the world's greatest hero, and who taught us when we pray to say: Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name.

Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.

Give us this day our daily bread.

And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors.

And led us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold for a moment for me to make a request? Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the vocational bill is taken up again I may have 40 minutes in which to address the House. I think this is the only request I have ever made in my somewhat lengthy service.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not sure that he understood the gentleman, but the Chair understood the gentleman to ask that when the vocational bill is again taken up he may have 40 minutes in which to address the House in committee. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman expect to use that time in opposition to this particular bill?

Mr. CANNON. I do.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

When the House adjourned yesterday the previous question had been ordered on the passport bill.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last evening the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] had the floor on the question of privilege which I had raised. As I understand, the gentleman from Ohio does not care to submit anything further on that, and, as I understand, the Speaker is inclined to think this is not a matter of privilege, and at the suggestion of the Speaker I desire to ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes, in which I want to discuss one or two statements made by the gentleman from Ohio, so as to get the record straight.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as there is no matter of privilege in it, does the gentleman object to deferring his request until we pass the pending bill?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; and my reason for it is this: It will only take five minutes, and will let it come in immediately after the debate and the proceedings of last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I shall briefly recapitulate my contention, so that Members who were not present will understand. The rules of the House specifically provide that the rules of the House shall control the action in the Committee of the Whole and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union wherever applicable. The rules of the House specifically provide that after the roll has been once called, the Clerk shall call the names of Members not answering on the first roll call. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], chairman of the committee, based his decision upon the decision of Mr. Speaker Crisp in 1894. If Members of the House will investigate that decision, they will find that Mr. Speaker Crisp rendered that opinion offhand. It was not challenged. It was immaterial at the time, and there has not been any discussion I have been able to find, for the reason that this is the only time that I know of that it has ever been raised. Now, I have investigated, the older Members of the House having helped, as to when the custom first grew up. The gentleman from Ohio stated last evening it was a practice of recent years, since the House Office Building was built. He is in error in that. In 1880 the insistence of Members was such that Mr. Blackburn, of Kentucky, chairman of the Committee on Rules, brought in certain amendments to the rules, including one which provided for this second roll call. He suggests that the second call is only upon a "call of the House." The rule is very clear, Mr. Speaker; it says upon "every roll call." That includes any roll call, because there is no rule of the House governing the call of rolls in the committee other than the rule that the rules of the House shall control, because paragraph 8 of section 23 specifically says that the rules of the House shall control. But the gentleman says that section 841 of the manual states specifically that in the Committee of the Whole the roll is called but once. The gentleman is in error, and in order to get it in the RECORD I will read section 841, so that the House may see that the gentleman is incorrect in his quotation of that rule.

Paragraph 841 reads as follows:

Whenever a Committee of the Whole House or of the Whole House on the state of the Union finds itself without a quorum, which shall consist of 100 members, the Chairman shall cause the roll to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, etc.

That which the gentleman refers to under section 841 is the citation of the decision by Mr. Speaker Crisp, and it is not part of the rule at all. It is simply a citation found among the notes. Now, to conclude, I desire to make the suggestion that I am only interested in the orderly procedure of the House. The experience of the House has shown that it is infinitely wiser, it saves time, to permit the Clerk to call the roll, as provided by the rule, of those who failed to answer upon the first roll call; that it is more orderly and less productive of confusion and takes less time than to permit Members to gather around, as they did yesterday afternoon in the pit of the House, and let the Clerk call them one at a time.

I am only interested in the integrity of the rules of the House. It may be contended that the rule that he has suggested, while it overthrows the rules of the House, will serve the interest of the House by forcing Members to maintain a quorum. I agree with the gentleman that something should be done to keep a quorum. Gentlemen on the Republican side are having the same trouble the Democratic leaders had in a Democratic Congress. It is not a partisan proposition at all. Each side has always had trouble in keeping a quorum. If the gentlemen who are on the Committee on Rules will bring in a rule that will enforce, in a practical way, the attendance of Members, so that we can have a quorum all the time, I will gladly support it. The way to do it is not by an arbitrary decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in violation of the rules, but by a report of the Committee on Rules and by solemn vote of the Members of the House, with notice first given to them, so that they can express their opinion by voting on an amendment to the rules. It is not within the authority of a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to change the rules of the House by his decision as Chairman because he thinks the change is necessary. The authority to amend the rules rests with the Members of the whole House, and they are rightfully jealous of this right. I am content to drop the matter, as I am assured that the rules in this respect will be respected in the future.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 7972. An act to improve the administration of the postal service in the Territory of Hawaii, in Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands;

H. R. 8986. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Paris-Hugo Bridge Co. to construct a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River, near Arthur City, Lamar County, Tex.; and

H. R. 6810. An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

EXTENSION OF PASSPORT CONTROL.

The SPEAKER. The question arises on the passport bill, on which the previous question was ordered.

First, the question is on agreeing to the amendments. If a separate vote is not demanded on any amendment, the Chair will put them en grosse.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was engrossed and ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, division; and, pending that, I think, inasmuch as this is an important matter, there should be a roll call; and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, pending the division, makes the point that there is no quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the bill will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 315, nays 1, answered "present" 2, not voting 112, as follows:

ENROLLMENT OF FOOD-CONTROL BILL.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate concurrent resolution No. 12, providing for certain corrections in the enrollment of the food-control act.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. To ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. There is one unanimous-consent request pending already. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, requests unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the following Senate concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Senate concurrent resolution 12.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 8624) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917," the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "an" in line 31 of section 106 of the bill as agreed upon in conference and to insert in lieu thereof the word "on"; also in section 112 where they twice appear and in section 114 where they once appear strike out the words "treasury of the District of Columbia" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia"; and in section 118, line 5, of the bill as agreed upon in conference, strike out "for" where it first occurs and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the effect of all these changes?

Mr. HAUGEN. Two amendments are simply to correct typographical errors; a change of words from "an" to "on" and from "for" to "or." In setting up the type they added "f" to the word "or," making it "for" instead of "or," and made another word read "an" instead of "on." In the bill it is stated that the moneys "shall be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia." There is no such treasury; it is now proposed that the money shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, who is responsible for five or six errors in a short resolution?

Mr. HAUGEN. Some one over in the printing department; I could not say. The errors were made in setting up the type.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Were those errors in the original bill? Did you people make the errors or was it the printer?

Mr. HAUGEN. In the bill as it was agreed to the word was "on" instead of "an," and the word "or" instead of "for." That has been discovered. The bill as passed provided that the money should be "paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but this resolution strikes out a whole sentence.

Mr. HAUGEN. It simply strikes out the word "an" and inserts the word "on," and strikes out the word "for" and inserts the word "or," and strikes out "the treasury of the District of Columbia" and inserts "the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The printer did not do that.

Mr. HAUGEN. Not the last. As I said, there are two typographical errors.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What they need down there is proof readers.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is very easy to make a mistake of that kind. I am not criticizing it.

The SPEAKER. It is not easy to make a mistake about the "treasury of the District of Columbia," when there never was any such thing on the face of the earth and never will be.

Mr. HAUGEN. It was made at the suggestion of an expert, who probably knows more about the District of Columbia than anybody else. But such mistakes will happen.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he does not think in line 8 of the second paragraph of section 106 the word "an" and the oblique line ought to be omitted? That is introducing a new theory in legislation, attempting to insert "or" for "an" and the word "for" for the word "or," so that the sentence can be read either way. Will the gentleman accept an amendment to strike out the oblique line "or," so that the resolution might include the amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture how much time he expects this will consume?

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not expect it will take up five minutes. It is not necessary to discuss it. The resolution itself indicates what is required, which is simply to correct the typographical errors and to make the changes indicated.

Mr. FESS. Assuming that the gentleman is mistaken and that debate will start, will the gentleman then withdraw it?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. I do not think it will take more than a minute to dispose of it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield for one observation?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to state that this is an illustration of the impropriety of much of our rider legislation. The Committee on Agriculture of neither body in Congress had any business with this Ball bill. It belonged in the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Committee on Agriculture, it develops, did not know that there is no treasury of the District of Columbia, and it is not surprising that they did not. That is not in their jurisdiction. The Committee on the District of Columbia would have known that fact and would have guarded against this kind of an error. I submit that the best legislation can be secured if the committees that have jurisdiction will exercise their jurisdiction and other committees keep out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, it has been beneficial in this respect, that it did teach the Committee on Agriculture that there was no such treasury. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, the trouble about the matter, as I view it, is that it came over here on a conference report, and then we had a rule which came in here which prevented us from amending it. Is not that the reason for the error? If we had had an ordinary resolution and power to correct after we had the conference report in here, these things could have been corrected by the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman can draw his own conclusion. The error was made in the printing department.

Mr. GARD. No; the error was made by the conferees.

Mr. HAUGEN. The conferees can not be held responsible for the typographical errors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. In reply to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] let me state that the suggestion came from the Committee on the District of Columbia. It was inserted at the suggested of the members of that committee.

Mr. CANDLER. I will state further that the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] as to the knowledge of the Committee on Agriculture are uncalled for and gratuitous, for everybody knows that the Committee on Agriculture knows more about everything in this House and where the treasuries are and everything else than any other committee of the House. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WALSH. I move to amend by striking out, in line 8 of the second paragraph of section 106, in the conference report, the oblique line and the word "or."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: In line 8 of the second paragraph of section 106 of the conference report, strike out the oblique line and the word "or."

Mr. WINGO. I should like to know what the effect of that amendment is. Let the Clerk report the text as it will read if so amended. Or, if the gentleman will explain it, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. WALSH. If the Chair will permit, it will then read:

If the commission determines that such rents, charges, service, or other terms or conditions are unfair or unreasonable, it shall determine and fix such fair and reasonable rent or charges therefor, and fair and reasonable service, terms, and conditions of use or occupancy.

Mr. WINGO. What change do you make by that amendment?

Mr. WALSH. They have the word "and" there followed by an oblique line and the word "or," in order that the paragraph may be read either way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the resolution with the amendment which has been agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT ON THE COTTON CROP.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up H. J. Res. 230, authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare and issue a supplementary report on the condition of the cotton crop.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a House joint resolution, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. KING. I will.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. This resolution will not take over five minutes. If it does, I will agree to withdraw it. I am satisfied that no Member of the House will object to it if he will allow me three minutes in which to state its purpose.

Mr. CANDLER. It is unanimously indorsed by all the Members of Congress from the cotton States, and we think it very important to pass this resolution at once.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This joint resolution is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to prepare and publish not later than November 2, 1919, a supplementary estimate of the condition of the cotton crop as of the date October 25, 1919.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9203. An act to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce; and

H. R. 1429. An act adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. McFADDEN, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SINNOTT, indefinitely, on account of the death of his daughter. (Request made by Mr. MCARTHUR.)

To Mr. BRAND, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

To Mr. BOOHER, for the remainder of this session, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the question of the power of the Government to appoint ambassadors. It is a legal proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the power of the Government to appoint ambassadors. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this embrace the subject of appointing an ambassador to Ireland?

Mr. MASON. Yes; and to South Africa, or any other country. It is simply a recitation of the authorities upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, is it the gentleman's own compilation?

Mr. MASON. Yes; it is my own compilation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the passport bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDUSTRIAL VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4438) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the leave of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe I shall occupy the 40 minutes, but for fear that I may do so I wish to be reminded at the expiration of 35 minutes. I also desire to say to the committee that I want to make this talk as brief as possible, and for the present, at least, I would be glad not to be interrupted. I have no manuscript. Being of Quaker descent, I have got to preach the gospel as the spirit moves me. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the war, I pray God, may soon be legally over. Technically it is not over. We had to go to war. They blew up our ships in mid-ocean. We did go to war; we had over 4,000,000 people engaged in that Great War. I will not weary you except to refer to it. You know all about it. Thank God, the armistice came and we with those with whom we cooperated prevailed. [Applause.]

Now we have got to unscramble the eggs. We have got to pay the expenses of the war. They have got to be paid by taxation. We have got to keep our pledges to the boys that were in the front, who had the muskets and the artillery, who bore the brunt of the Great War. Of course, we had to support them from home, for if that link of the chain had broken we would have failed. The chain is no stronger than its weakest link. At times we had a hell of a time at home. [Laughter.] Wages were increased; prices of everything were increased; strikes threatened and coming; we were dictated to; but the soldier did not complain. The trouble was at home.

We have just passed a passport bill. I think it was unanimous, but there may have been one vote against it. You recall the debate of yesterday. It was claimed that the majority of the people who are now striking in the United States are not American citizens. If we only had the power to take them by the nape of the neck and the slack of the breeches and throw them across the ocean, we would have done the job. [Laughter and applause.] Most of them are ignorant, and some of them vicious, as was said yesterday, and I am taking that because it was not disputed by anybody, and they do not wish well to the Government, except as they can be employed and better their condition and go back home.

I am making no attack upon them. God knows that as long as the people in this country will obey the law and aid in the maintenance of our industries, for one I will welcome them, and I welcome the great number of people—and there are a large number—that will be naturalized, who are children of those in the second, third, fourth, and fifth generation who came from across the ocean. They make good American citizens. God knows that as near as I can make up my own ancestry, those who came to this New World, if they had not come, a part of us would be in Ireland. [Laughter and applause.] A little bit would be in Germany and a little bit in France.

The glory of this country has been that under our Constitution local matters are controlled by the States, and national matters are controlled by the Nation. It is a long way to San Francisco—3,000 miles—and a long way from the Canadian border down to the Gulf—2,000 miles and plus. We have got our hands full in performing the functions of the Congress in legislating for the Federal Government, but there is a tendency to go not in a walk, not in a trot, but in a run to transfer power that the States should exercise to the United States Government and administer the same from Washington.

I am not going to say that you Democrats are to blame for it. The truth is that while you are six, we are half a dozen in the premises. [Laughter and applause.]

This bill that I am going to talk about, gentlemen, I want to say is not a partisan bill. It can not pass alone by Republican votes, it can not pass alone by Democratic votes. It is a patriotic thing, in my judgment, to defeat this bill, and it can not be done unless we keep in view the great work before us, with $4,000,000,000 plus to raise annually by taxation, or further embarrass our credit by issuing bonds, and it will touch all of us.

We, on our side, can not make it a partisan question, and you on your side can not make it a partisan question. So it is in this spirit that I come to talk to you. I do not want to abuse anybody or make myself uncomfortable, but I want to call a spade a spade, and speak plainly and directly as I may be led to speak.

We have a national vocational education act to take care of our soldier boys, and we are trying to get ready to do it. It is said that slow progress has been made with that work. I expect that is true. The hearings show that $1,000,000, in round numbers, has been paid in salaries to that board. According to the soldiers' paper which I have in my hand, a very insignificant amount of vocational training has been accomplished. Those that are trained and are in training are only as two to every $2,500 or five or six or seven thousand dollar man on the board who is on salary. Pretty slow progress has been made.

Mr. Chairman, there never was in the tide of time such provision made to care for any Army on earth as was made to care for our Army. About 75,000 are buried in France. God knows I would resurrect them if I could. It is not a very large death rate, it is true, considering the great number of people we had there. "Would you go if you were a young man, Mr. CANNON, for $32 a month?" Well, unless it was absolutely necessary to help preserve the Government, I would answer "No" to that question. I do not suppose any of those boys wanted to go except that they did so from a patriotic standpoint. They are dead. Those who survive them, the wife or the dependent parent or the dependent child, and still broader than that, under the war-risk act are better provided for than any Army was provided for in the history of the world. Think of the $900,000,000 of insurance that went to the dependents of those soldiers.

The $10,000 or the $5,000, whatever the sum might have been, goes to the beneficiaries of those who are dead in payments covering a period of 20 years. Of course, we are all glad that we voted for legislation of that kind, to make that provision for the soldiers and those who survived them. We did not halt, when it came to war legislation, on either side of the House, about voting for anything and everything that would help us win the war. We would do it again if we were in war.

Having said that much about it, let me speak about those who are receiving vocational training. They do not have to go. The war-risk bill makes large provisions. It runs up as high as $200 a month for complete disability; $100 a month is the largest amount that was ever provided for a soldier. All kinds of rates are made, and they are liberal. Would you be in their condition for that much? Oh, no! But we voted for that liberal act, and we are going to pay for it cheerfully and patriotically.

Some one here has said that this bill will cost the American people annually only 1 cent each, which would be true if we levied a direct tax on all the 100,000,000 people to meet the expense, but the returns of the Internal Revenue Bureau indicate that only about 3 per cent of the people pay an income tax, and that 3 per cent is largely in the industrial States, which have already made pretty fair provision for their unfortunates. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that one-fourth of the States last year paid three-fourths of all the revenue collected for the Federal Government, and that three-fourths of the States contributed less than one-fourth of the total revenues. You propose to further tax the industrious and frugal to take care of the unfortunate in all sections of the country.

But this is not the only legislation of this character proposed to this Congress. The junior Senator from Texas also has a bill now before the Senate to "encourage instruction in maternity and infancy, and to aid in extending proper care for maternity and infancy, and to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such instruction and care."

That bill provides for a direct appropriation of $480,000 for each year, $10,000 of which shall be paid annually to each State from the Federal Treasury. It also provides for an appropriation of $2,000,000,000 annually on the basis of like appropriations by the States. Here is another draft of $2,500,000 a year on the Federal Treasury to aid the States in looking after what the State boards of health should do for each State. There are many other things which can be suggested when the Congress enters upon this character of legislation, and the billions we have spent on war will be continued in centering in Washington great bureaus to look after the people regardless of their ability or their disposition to have all their domestic affairs controlled from Washington.

These bureaus will be models, no doubt, but I fear they may be little more effective than the models in the Patent Office which are stored there to preserve them and for exhibition to the tourists who visit the National Capital, while the unfortunate who do not advertise their misfortunes will continue to suffer in ignorance of these bureaus.

But this legislation minimizes the importance of that for the rehabilitation of the soldiers who were disabled in defense of the whole country, to whom the Nation owes every possible care. Before that legislation has been put into practical operation for the rehabilitation of the soldiers you propose to extend the same benefits to the whole population, regardless of their sacrifices for the Nation—to those who found excuse to remain at home while the boys were in France fighting against Germany. That is, to my mind, one most effective way of indicating that the soldiers deserve no more from Congress than the men and women who made no effort to defend the country.

Do you know what I think of this country? I will just cast my eye about here, letting it rest upon the Members of Congress who are about me, and if all were here I would say what I am going to say now. The best education that is received in this country is that which is received about the hearthstone, from the wife, the husband, the parents, the home, whether that home be a log cabin or in a frame building or what not, and while I believe in book learning, yet if I had a family of boys, every one of them would be so trained that they would earn a living. That is the best of all educations. Of course, we are very liberal in our educational system, and nearly all of the States have compulsory education.

Reading, writing, and ciphering was what I got—as far as the rule of 3. That is what I had. At the age of 15 years I was compelled to go to work—my father having been drowned—to help support the family. I am awkward perhaps in my sentences, but the education that I received upon the hearthstone and in the log schoolhouse I would not exchange, if I could turn back the leaves of time and be young again, for all the training that could be given me in all of the universities of the world. [Applause.]

How are you going to have the Republic preserved? It will be done by keeping the hearthstone, and through the present and the coming generations receiving practical education. I once had a client who owned considerable land who could not read or write. However, he was an awfully good cattleman, was honest, and a good citizen. He was a Democrat, and I used to quarrel with him about voting the Democratic ticket, but he said that he saw the light in that way, and that he was going to do, and he did it up to the time of his death.

One day when he came to see me I said to him, "How is your neighbor, Mr. Jones?" He, too, had lots of land, as this client of mine had. He replied, "Oh, he is getting along pretty well." "Cattle good?" "Yes." Then I said to him, "He has a large family and you have a large family." "Yes, yes," he replied. I said to him, "What are they doing?" and he said to me, "Why, he is sending three gals and two boys over to Asbury College"—it is now Depauw University—"to take a course." I said, "That is all right; he has the money and he has worked hard." "Oh, Joe," said he, "them Jones boys and gals will come back and they will be eddicated idiots," and they were. [Laughter.] Oh, Mr. Chairman, I am not against universities, and I am not against colleges, but let me tell you you have got to take the men who work in the factories, and their children, and those that sail on the lakes and on the ocean, and others who work when you come to consider the men who go to make up the real people of this country, for you can not get along without practical education.

Mr. Chairman, in one respect I am just as good a democrat as any Democrat on the Democratic side of this House. Thank God that the great Civil War is behind us; that the wounds are healed; and that we now have but one common purpose. No one has ever heard me say things about anybody, about any Member of Congress or any Senator, because I happened to disagree with him on principle, simply because he was a Democrat, because I regard him as my peer and I regard myself as his peer.

"Well, now, Mr. CANNON, why do not you talk about the bill?" [Laughter.] Oh, I have been laying the foundation to talk about the bill. Let us now consider vocational training. They have $14,000,000 to take care of the soldiers now for this year. They have trained very few. They have spent a million dollars in salaries—large salaries—and they have trained very few. I hope they will do better. Secretary Glass the other day, as I read in the papers, appeared before a Senate committee and said that he would recommend $20,000,000 more for vocational training, and, God knows, if they need it, I say $20,000,000 or $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 for vocational training for the soldiers, and whatever is needed for that purpose. That is as far as I want to go. "Well, Mr. CANNON, does not this bill want us to go further?" Yes; and that is what I object to. We have 38 States already acting independently of Congress, with their various laws passed for compensation for accidents in civil life, with the courts open, with the manufacturers in the main insuring against accidents to their employees, and, as far as compensation itself goes, it is large, it is liberal, when you come to take up the whole question. The States have done it, and the States ought to continue to do it.

Oh, somebody may say, "Why are you talking?" I am talking on the merits, and if I have not said so already I do not want the necessity of keeping our pledge to the boys who fought our battles in France to be used as a makeshift to take the same machinery and use it to give vocational training to those in civil life who did not go to war. Do you know what is to happen? If I state it wrong, somebody interrupt me. During this Congress you are to bring in a bill here to make the Commissioner of Education a Cabinet member. God knows if I had the power I would have less Cabinet positions than now, because they could be administered without duplication and at far less expense and perform their duty by giving service more promptly than is now given. Under these various departments having jurisdiction we have duplication of all kinds. I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and you ought to hear the several departments pull and haul about the importance of having all the money they want to duplicate in the same kind of work. We have got to get rid of that, and ought to get rid of it. I agree with Mr. Speaker CLARK that we have got Cabinet officers enough. I am opposed to the creation of any more. Yet I am informed that the next step is to create a department of education to take the place of the Commissioner of Education. The States are caring for education. A department of education located in Washington to boss the education of the whole country would be injurious to education in the States. Now, as a general proposition, I want to make this statement: The men who are college professors, on the average, are not good business men.

Yet, if there is to be a department of education it would be dominated by college professors. But whenever you find an exception I can count you 50 of them who are not competent for practical work outside of the book education. Now, so much for that. This vocational bill which we passed for the soldiers I voted for. What is the condition of the country? "We are getting $1.10 for corn now, whereas we got $2; hogs have fallen off 25 per cent, and so on and so on." Yes; and they will go off more and the price of corn will go lower, the price of land will go lower, not in real value, not in purchasing power when you come to exchange them for something to eat and the wherewithall to be clothed, but we will get back some time or other to the normal. But you know we will not do it without pulling teeth. Why, there are plenty of farmers raising cotton, and raising corn, and raising cattle, and doing this and that and the other, so busy they do not stop to analyze the situation, and when you keep your taxation, and we can not reduce it below $4,000,000,000, and it will be more instead of less, and it will last until successors are seated in every seat of this House of those who are now in it, and hell will be to pay and no pitch hot; and, gentlemen, there is no doubt about it. "Mr. CANNON, are you a Republican?" "Yes." I believe in the principle of protection. You Democrats do not. We used to fight about it. We used to get about $300,000,000 that way, a good deal of money to help along under normal conditions.

We can not under any conditions levy any kind of a tariff to get over $500,000,000. Where is the $4,000,000,000 to come from to meet our annual expenditures? Why, we have had prohibition during the war, and that will not be a practical question in the next campaign nor the next nor the next, but it will take nearly half a billion from our revenues. It is a question of taxation. What is it to go on? On manufactured products, on sales by wholesale people of 1 per cent? I hope they will never reach the retail people, because there is so many of them. Consumption taxes not proper. Yet we have got to be patriotic, and you Democrats have not any gimlet hole to look through from what I have to look through in settling the matter. [Laughter and applause.] I have great admiration for the majority floor leader. He is my personal and political friend, but I was not in sympathy with him when he got up here to talk on this bill the other day, and talked of how much we had reduced appropriations more than you had, and there were three or four of you making mouths at him. [Laughter.] Well, that was just camouflage, leather and prunella. That is all there is of it. Let us be honest with each other, leather and prunella. Now, when you read this bill through—we have it under the five-minute rule—read it clear through and you will find that the Commissioner of Education, with his associates, living in Washington, where you people, getting the benefit of the law, will not be here to pay half of it, you will find it so drawn that the whole thing is to be controlled and managed from Washington.

And I am not making any attack upon Dr. Claxton. He is a good-looking old man, you know. [Laughter.] But with the highest respect for him, he looks through the keyhole at the universe, and "It is me and my wife and my son John and his wife; us four and no more." I do not know whether he has a wife or not, but I do know that he is just a specialist. Whereas when it comes to levying taxes in Georgia and North Carolina, Illinois, Indiana, New York, and the other States, you had better leave these matters of caring for the citizens in those various States to the States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to talk in that seven minutes right from the shoulder.

You know that you are organizing your party and we are organizing ours. We are going to have quite a scrap. Whichever one prevails, I am satisfied the sun will rise and we will move on when the scrap is over. You have national committeemen and we have national committeemen. The national committeemen superintend the whole thing in the presidential campaign. They are useful people. I have no stones to throw at them or no stones to throw at the present men holding those places. I expect they are able men. I have a slight acquaintance with Mr. Hays. I do not believe I have ever met with your Democratic national leader; but we will scrap it out without tearing of hair in the next campaign. I hope we will win. Maybe you will win. If so, I will be just as loyal to this Government, if it is so decided by a vote of the majority, as I will be if it is decided our way.

What are you going to say to these national committees? I am not acquainted with the Democratic national committee. I think Mr. Hays, of the Republican committee, from all I hear about him, is a very able man. I was surprised and grieved when it was given out on this side of the House to as good, but no better, Republicans than I am, "You must vote this way. Hays wants it." My God, what would he do with it? He may want it, but what would he do with it? Is this supposed to be a bill for votes? For whom? Men that labor? Is that the supposition? That is the idea if it means anything. Do you think that you will let us do that kind of thing, if that is the motive, without making your record? And you would split even on it. In the meantime the Government would suffer. Oh, I would like to be able to sing that song with a voice that would reach from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that old song of the church:

Increase my courage, Lord.

[Applause.]

Now, then, I was indignant. And I want to here and now, so far as I am concerned, to express my hope and belief that the Republican national committee leader, Mr. Hays, never has been interfering in this matter. I should be sorry, indeed, if it was proved that he did interfere; that he was responsible for this word going around on our side of the House, "He wants that; he wants that"; and that it meant votes.

Let us be honest with each other, my side and your side. If he did say it, I would pray God that he would repent and seek forgiveness for that political sin and never sin any more. [Applause.]

Now, I have not talked a great deal about the merits of this bill. I am going to talk possibly under the five-minute rule, here and there, on an amendment that I may desire to offer. I can not discuss it from beginning to end in the time that I have. But I felt that in good faith I might talk to my Republican friends and my Democratic friends and exhort them not to try to make a partisan measure out of something that is not partisan. [Applause.] We have enough to talk about on each side when the time comes.

Mr. Chairman, have I still some time?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I thought the gentleman was through.

Mr. CANNON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming, the majority leader. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, how times have changed when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] gets his applause on the Democratic side of the aisle.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will yield, if they vote as well as they applaud we will defeat this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. And the gentleman's 10 minutes was very evidently utilized for the purpose of consolidating the Democratic vote against this bill. And I say, how times have changed! Well, I at one time tried to consolidate the Democratic side against a measure that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was for. He was in favor of putting two Territories in the Southwest together into one State, and I got into a little insurgency to prevent that being done; we tried to get enough Republicans to join with the Democrats to put it over. Well, we did not accomplish it at that time. The organization of those days was a little bit too well knitted together. But eventually it came out our way, because it was right that it should. Finally we admitt 1 Arizona and New Mexico as two separate States, as we had contended we should.

Again I say, how times have changed, when the gentleman from Illinois, of all others, appeals for support to the Democratic side and secures his applause from that side!

Now, something has been said in regard to a gentleman by the name of Hays, who is somewhat prominent politically. Mr. Hays's opinion was asked as to this bill. He did not volunteer any suggestion with regard to it. An inquiry was made of him as to what he thought of it, and he said he thought it was a very excellent measure—a very excellent measure [applause]—showing that the gentleman's views are sound, the gentleman's heart is right, and that, in addition to that, the gentleman has good political sense and judgment. [Applause.]

If the Democratic Party desires to take the responsibility of beating this bill, all well and good. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that every man on that side shall vote against it if he wants to. If they do, we will make the issue on those lines.

Now, gentlemen, I say again what I have said before——

Mr. BOX. May I ask the gentleman to yield? Would the gentleman prefer a political issue to winning on a meritorious legislative question?

Mr. MONDELL. I would not. I do not want to see a political issue on this or any other question that is not political in this House, but if the gentlemen will insist on making it political by applauding arguments against the bill, that is their affair and not mine.

Now, all these gentlemen who are standing up and protesting that they really are for the bill will have abundant opportunity to set themselves right when we come to vote on the bill. So it is not necessary to discuss that now. They will have their golden opportunity to put themselves right when it comes to the vote.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. My time is very brief. I do not know that the House is going to give me any more time, and I have a number of things I would like to say.

Mr. WELLING. If the gentleman desires——

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] proceeded under an allotment of time.

Mr. MONDELL. If a motion is needed, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding——

Mr. LAZARO. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he did not want to make it a political measure?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not. I have not at any time.

Mr. LAZARO. Did I understand the gentleman to say that they had consulted Mr. Hays about it?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Hays was asked about various measures—as to his opinion relative to them.

Mr. LAZARO. Inasmuch as you do not want to make it a political question, did you consult the national Democratic committeeman?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not happen to know that honorable gentleman; otherwise, I might have asked his opinion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, years ago there was ground and reason for a wide difference of opinion in this country relative to the proper activities and functions of the Federal Government. They were the good old days when gentlemen on the Democratic side, at least, and some on the other side preached the doctrine of laissez faire—the doctrine of "let it alone," the doctrine of "do nothing if you can avoid it," the doctrine that that was the best government that governed least; and there is something to be said on that side of the question, and I have sometimes argued it.

But, Mr. Chairman, we long since on both sides of the aisle, on the Democratic side quite as much as on our side, departed from that old doctrine. Long since we began to widen Federal activities and appropriate for a wide variety of purposes, among others for the protection of property, and I do not recall that any of the gentlemen who just applauded arguments against this bill which deals with the humanities have been voting against appropriations to cure hog cholera, to combat the Texas cattle tick, to stamp out the boll weevil, to control pine-bark rust, to stamp out in New England the chestnut blight.

Ah, when property is involved, when men's pocketbooks are affected, when it is proposed to protect men in their opportunities to make money gentlemen are not so tender with regard to the expenditures of Federal money and they are not so disturbed with regard to extensions of Federal authority, control, direction, or expenditures. But when we come to the humanities, when we reach the question of whether or no we shall care for our citizenship, whether or no we shall give encouragement, aid, direction, advice, and help in the salvage of unfortunate humanity, to save men from lives of bitterness and despair, my God, how gentlemen quake lest we too far extend the activities of the Federal Government! [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that most of these appropriations which the gentleman from Wyoming has mentioned have been made during normal times of our Government and preceding the Great War, the result of which we must prepare to meet in the future?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, we have made them in normal times and we have made them in abnormal times, and we have made more of them for Texas, the great and glorious State of Texas, from which the gentleman hails, than for any other area under the flag.

Mr. BLANTON. You could not have made them for a better State.

Mr. MONDELL. No; and I have voted for them, voted to stamp out the cotton-boll weevil, to stamp out the Texas tick. We have poured out millions, millions upon millions, that men's property might be protected, that men might be prosperous, and gentlemen have voted for these things enthusiastically. But now when we suggest that it is time that the Nation encourage the betterment of the race, help to save men from despair and restore them to lives of hope and usefulness, these gentlemen who are willing to vote millions for the eradication of the boll weevil and for the extermination of hog cholera are suddenly stricken with panic lest the Federal Government embark on new and questionable activities and enterprises.

Mr. Chairman, I have never called myself a "progressive," and some people have one time and another called me a "reactionary." I have not cared much, for I have been conscious of keeping an open mind and a forward-looking view. I hope that I grow with the growth and development of the views of the world. I hope that if I ever held to the narrow view that the Federal Government may not give consideration and attention to the vital needs and problems of its citizenship I have outgrown it. [Applause.] I want to keep an open mind, and I hope that my footsteps shall be forward and not backward and that when I fight for restrictions of Federal activity it will not be in the domain of the humanities. [Applause.] I appeal to all forward-looking men on both sides of this aisle to remember the responsibility of the Nation in guiding and encouraging the people of the States and their communties in caring for the unfortunate and in building up here, in the fairest land on earth, the best citizenship under the sun. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Mr. FESS, and Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is recognized.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to reiterate again to-day the sentiment which I expressed to the committee on this subject on day before yesterday, that I deeply regret that in the discussion of this bill upon its merits these extraneous and unnecessary questions of party expediency or political alignments should have been injected into the debate on this bill.

But I want to address the few remarks that I am going to make here to-day particularly to my colleagues on the Democratic side of this House. I do not want any Democrat here to be driven by these arguments that have been injected into this discussion by the controversy that has arisen here to-day between the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the distinguished leader of the majority in this House [Mr. MONDELL]—to be driven away from the real, just, fair consideration of this measure upon its merits.

I want to say this further to you: It is not a Republican measure. I speak it modestly—I was the original author of this bill in either House of Congress in the days of the Sixty-fifth Congress. The bill that a few days ago unanimously passed the Senate of the United States was the bill introduced at the last session of Congress by Senator SMITH of Georgia, and reintroduced at this session by Senator SMITH of Georgia, a Democrat, and it bears his name.

I do not care what Mr. Hays, the chairman of the Republican campaign committee, says about this bill in expressing an opinion upon its merits, nor do I care what Mr. Cummings, our chairman, might say about its merits. There were 35 Democrats, at least, on the test vote here the other day to strike out the enacting clause of this bill who registered their conviction that aside from any other consideration that has been injected into this debate it was a constructive measure for humanity upon its merits, and I am sure they voted for it and that many, at least, will continue to vote for it from that consideration. There are a lot of men in this House who voted for $100,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury to feed foreigners at the last session of Congress. For myself, I voted against it from considerations that appeared to me sufficient at that time.

I do not criticize the votes of those who voted for it; but what shall we say to our constituents, gentlemen, if we register a vote against this humane proposition? The man back there will say, "You voted $100,000,000 to feed alien peoples, did you not?" "Yes." "What was your vote on the Smith-Fess bill that came up in the Sixty-sixth Congress? Was not that a measure to help our own people, to cooperate with the States, as you have done in the construction of good roads, and in the eradication of diseases and in the maintenance of the public health and in the establishment of vocational education for our own folks?" "Yes; that was what it was intended for, to bring some small measure of the Government's actual benefits to the front doors and hearthstones of the people," that my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was talking about a few moments ago. How are you going to justify a vote against this measure?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think when we come to vote on this bill in the House we ought to vote down the committee amendment that makes this applicable only to certain classes who are crippled and that we ought to make it universal in its application?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to the amendment personally, offered a few days ago by the gentleman from Texas, but that is only a minor issue. Some gentlemen are seeking to make an issue here from the standpoint of the political angle, and that is the reason I took the floor—to warn my Democratic colleagues who are favorably impressed with the merits of this measure as a constructive, forward-looking, uplifting, upbuilding, regenerating measure, not to be drawn away from the allegiance dictated by their minds, hearts, and judgments by any false political issue that may be injected into the bill here upon the floor. [Applause.]

Mr. SEARS. What bill does the gentleman refer to in the Sixty-fifth Congress—the Smith-Fess bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I intended to refer to the Smith-Bankhead bill in the Sixty-fifth Congress. In that Congress I introduced a bill which was practically the same as this one. It was introduced at this session by the chairman of the committee, as is the practice, and it bears his name. There is no pride upon my part or upon his part as to the authorship of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to see if we can not reach an agreement to close debate upon this section and all amendments thereto. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes.

Mr. GARD. There are several amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all debate on section 1 of the bill and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want a few minutes on this matter. I am not particular about having the time on this section. I do not want to talk about any amendment to this section. I want to talk on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I object.

Mr. FESS. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes, the time to be controlled by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has been here a good while, and I suggest that if he presses his motion we will simply waste time on a roll call or two, and that he had better give way for an hour on these propositions. Several gentlemen want to express their opinions.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want to say a word on it, but I do believe the gentleman will save time by giving an hour.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. FESS. We spent all day on this section the other day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I know.

Mr. FESS. I asked to read section 2 before we adjourned, but we were unable to read it. We have spent all the time to-day on this same section and we are just where we were when we adjourned the other day.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman knows that we have not considered the bill at all to-day. We have had a speech by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and one by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], almost entirely independent of the merits of the bill. There are a number of us who have amendments to the bill, and I would suggest to the gentleman that he make it an hour instead of 40 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that all debate on section 1 and all amendments thereto close in one hour.

Mr. FESS. The time to be controlled by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 2, line 22, after the figures "$34,000" insert "Provided, That if any discrimination is made on account of color, sex, or religion, in the use of the funds herein authorized, the State so offending shall forfeit all its rights to further participation in the benefits provided for in this act."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserves a point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I offer this amendment so that if this bill becomes a law there will be no question, but that it will be impartially administered. By reason of the war thousands and thousands of women and girls have been thrown into the business activities of this country, in factory, in shop, and on farms, who were never engaged in such pursuits before. The census reports will show that more cripples have resulted among women and girls, in consequence of their new activities, than there have been in all the history of the country before. There should be no discrimination in this measure, therefore, on account of sex, as I think we will all admit.

By the same token there were thousands and thousands and tens of thousands of colored people who never worked in a factory or shop before in their lives who, by reason of the necessities of the occasion and because of the demand of the Government for the greatest productivity of these great factories, went into them, and colored help had to be resorted to in many sections of this country where it was never used before. This is notably true in my district. There are more than 20,000 colored men employed in the steel and other great industrial factories in that section of the country that were never employed in such capacity before. There is not a day that passes but what scores of these men are crippled. It would be a crime against humanity if this bill should become a law and these men were denied its advantages.

There is another thing this amendment provides, and that is that there shall be no discrimination on account of religious belief. We may assert what we think with reference to this proposition, but there is no question but what there is extant in this country a prejudice against certain religious beliefs in some localities. Discrimination has followed in times past against those who have certain religious beliefs, and it is fair to presume that what has happened in the past will happen in the future.

There can be no reasonable objection made to the adoption of this amendment. It will safeguard it so as to make its benefits apply everywhere, to all classes, as I think the framers of this bill intended that it should apply. There should be no question whether in the North, the South, the East, or the West of discrimination with regard to religious belief or color or sex, as to whom the benefits of this bill should apply. Therefore I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment is not germane to the bill or to the section to which it is offered. It is not a limitation upon the appropriation. It undertakes to vest the exercise of judicial discretion and ascertainment in the executive branch of the Government. If the Chair will read the amendment he will see that it provides that if any discrimination shall be made in the expenditure of this fund on account of race or religion, the State so offending shall forfeit its proportional part of the appropriation.

An amendment is supposed to be self-enforcing. A point of order has been frequently made where an amendment involved the exercise of discretion which is in the nature of a judicial discretion that it is not germane, and certainly under the provisions of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana it would be necessary for the Executive or that member having the disbursement of this fund and the expenditure to make a judicial ascertainment upon a possibly disputed state of facts as to whether or not there had been on the part of any State, or the officials of the State, any discrimination. I think from that consideration it is not a germane amendment, because it is not susceptible of any other reasonable or logical construction. It remits the ascertainment of a judicial decision on a state of facts admitted or disputed to the officer having the administration of this fund. Besides that, I do not think it is germane under the ordinary rules.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the Chair care to hear from me?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, but the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, there is no question about the amendment being germane. It is a restriction which may amount to a penalty. It limits and is on all fours with the terms of the bill. It may be a limitation on the appropriation. If a certain event happens, it is a limitation on the appropriation, and, in the event of discrimination, then the State so offending shall not participate further in this fund. There it becomes a forced limitation. It is a restriction in the nature of a penalty and a restriction in the nature of a penalty may be germane. Limitations certainly are germane.

I call the attention to the language of the bill on page 3, where restrictions are provided for, commencing with line 21, that no portion of any moneys appropriated by this act for the benefit of the States shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, preservation, erection, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment or for the purchase or rental of any lands.

There is a restriction. This is of the same character of restriction. The language of the bill provides that no portion of the fund shall be expended for buildings or grounds. If those in control used the funds to buy any buildings or grounds, they will be violating the law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman recognize the clear line of cleavage and distinction between a positive prohibition and one which leaves wide open the exercise of discretion or the determination of a judicial fact by an official?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is not a session of Congress but what some restriction or reservation equivalent to the one proposed in this amendment is passed. There is no difference, so far as the result and the consequences are concerned, between the limitations and restrictions provided for in the amendment and those against the purchase of grounds and buildings. This is a positive restriction.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The language in the bill is a positive restriction, and so is germane.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This is a positive restriction on the happening of a certain event.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill says that you can not buy land; that is positive that you can not do it. Let me ask the gentleman: If this amendment were adopted, and in the gentleman's own State of Indiana it was said that there was discrimination on the question of religion, would not that involve a determination and judicial decision by the administrative officer, acting in a judicial capacity, as to whether or not upon a given state of facts there had been a discrimination?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is not the gentleman familiar with the rule that inhibits the placing of a judicial determination on an executive officer?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would not call for the exercise of a judicial decision any more than the language in the bill does with reference to whether there has been an expenditure in the purchase of land or buildings. That would involve a judicial decision and it would involve hearings as to the facts and a final determination. This amendment is a positive restriction upon the happening of a certain event.

If that event never happened, there is no question but what there will be nothing to inquire about, any more than if there is no attempt ever made at the purchase of real estate. There would be no cause for investigation or judicial decision. Suppose that instead of having this reservation in reference to the purchase of real estate there was a qualifying clause that a certain character of real estate might be purchased. That would involve the same character of judicial inquiry that might be involved in the amendment proposed. It is equally positive, and the other would be equally positive.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the gentleman loses sight of the fact that that language is already incorporated in the bill presented by the committee.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It does not make a bit of difference. The committee can not arrogate to itself the entire right to make limitations or reservations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is inclined to think that if the pending bill as reported by the committee did not make several reservations or provisions as to what should be done further reservations would not be in order. But in view of the fact that this section already makes five reservations the Chair thinks it is competent for the House by amendment to add one more reservation to the section. If there was only one reservation, the Chair does not think it would be competent to add a further reservation as proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, but under the practice of the House it seems to the Chair, in view of the language of the bill making several reservations as to how the money shall be expended, or as to the conditions under which it shall be expended, that it is well within the rules of the House for the Committee of the Whole to add one or more reservations, as it sees proper to do so. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair yield for a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What does the Chair think about the point of order which I suggested, that it involves the vesting of judicial authority in the Executive, in the exercise of judicial discretion to ascertain whether or not a certain state of facts amounts to a discrimination.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that that matter ought to be decided by the committee itself upon the merits of the question, and the Chair overrules the point of order on the matter of germaneness and holds the matter to which the gentleman refers to be something for the Committee of the Whole to decide upon its merits.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest to the Chair, with all due respect, that that does not settle the parliamentary question. That leaves the decision of the point of order to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of this important question. There is not a man in this House who is not in favor of education against ignorance. There is no Member of the House that does not believe that a sound man is preferable for our national welfare to a man who is incapacitated as an economic question. We can not afford, therefore, to vote down this bill. Take a nation that is enlightened and compare it with a nation that is enshrouded in ignorance and darkness. I voted for an immigration bill that restricted people from entering the United States who could not read or write 20 words in their own language, and I would vote for such a bill again. We can not afford to vote down this bill and throw these men in the junk heap who are injured in our industries. I say, as an economic question, so far as our country is concerned, a man who can support himself is preferable to one who can not, the one being an asset and the other a liability. It changes a man from a consumer to a producer. What will a sound man add to the national wealth in a year? Take a farmer's boy who has lost a hand or a foot and who can no longer support himself. Fit him for useful employment and you make him an asset to the Nation, and he will be worth $500 a year in adding to the wealth of the Nation. He can be fitted for a teacher, a bookkeeper, a professional man, or for a mechanic in the industry instead of going through life a dependent. There is that difference between a man who is able to support himself and add to the wealth of the Nation, in being a useful member of society, of value to his country, and a man who is not.

What is there against this bill; what is there against the good things that can be said of it? You talk of education. I would not be standing before you to-day if it was not for the schooling in the little red school and our free institutions of learning. There is no value that can be put upon education. Compare a cripple who has become incapacitated with a man who can go ahead and transact the ordinary business of life. The latter adds to the wealth of the Nation. The only thing they say against this bill is—what? They say that we can not afford it at this time; that we are in debt. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] informed me the other day that our national wealth is $265,000,000,000. At the close of the Civil War our national wealth was only $18,000,000,000.

No, gentlemen, the danger to-day in our country is not the question of our indebtedness, important as that is. The question to-day of national issue is the spirit of unrest that is sweeping over our land. This unrest is brought about by a desire and an attempt to engraft new and dangerous principles into our form of government. Bolshevism has no place in our system of government. It is a dangerous experiment. We believe in the right and opportunity of every person to acquire and hold property, we believe in our homes, and we believe in the sacred right of wedlock. Our Constitution has been the basis of good government for all the nations of recent years that desired to change their form of government. Under it we have become great and powerful. Our forefathers and its defenders gave their lives freely for it, and it is our duty to preserve and protect it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman that a few moments ago the committee decided upon one hour's debate, the disposition of the time to be left to the Chair. The Chair has been trying to give five minutes to a gentleman upon each side, for and against, as far as he is able to discover how they stand. The Chair doubts that it is within the province of the Chair to submit the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then give me one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that he can do it with propriety. The Chair is very sorry, but since he must live up to the limit of the rule——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to further say that I would not vote a million and a half dollars for hog cholera and then refuse to vote for this bill.

Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK. Are we to vote on the amendments as offered or at the end of debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the proper way is to vote on the amendments at the end of the debate, but that is a matter for the committee to decide. The Chair would not presume to say how it would be disposed of.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry and a suggestion. The disposition of these pending amendments will determine considerably the attitude of Members toward the bill. Now, it seems to me, with all due respect to the Chair, that when these amendments are discussed they ought to be disposed of, because then we can discuss the bill, having in mind whether these amendments are a part of the bill or have failed to become a part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a matter of perfect indifference to the Chair how it is decided, whether disposition be made at the close of the discussion on each amendment or at the end of the hour's discussion. The Chair thinks some gentleman ought to state what disposition the committee wants to make of this and how.

Mr. GARRETT. May I make the suggestion to the Chair that it seems to me the gentleman from Texas is correct? Now, it is frequently the case with a rule brought in providing for amendments to a proposition in the House to provide that they shall be voted on at the end of debate, but within my recollection—I may be in error about it—that the orderly procedure when the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is for an amendment to be proposed, debated, and then voted on, and then take up the next. Of course, that does not affect the time limit at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if that is the judgment of the committee, the Chair is perfectly agreeable.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the amendments be voted upon separately.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Education what disposition he thinks ought to be made of these amendments, as to whether they should be disposed of before or at the close of the hour?

Mr. FESS. I think it would be more satisfactory to the committee if they were voted upon after each amendment was offered and debated—10 minutes' debate and then take a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, five minutes' debate for and against each amendment?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Would not that likely bring about a situation like this, that probably all the discussion in the hour will be on one amendment and there will be no time on the other amendments?

Mr. FESS. It would all close at the end of the hour.

Mr. BEE. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio—I want to be heard on this amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]. I do not care to discuss any other amendment, but I do want to be heard in opposition if I get a chance.

Mr. FESS. I think the situation mentioned by the two gentlemen from Texas reveals a rather delicate situation. Most of them want to debate this one particular amendment before we vote on it; is not that the case?

Mr. BLACK. I have another amendment.

Mr. FESS. Perhaps we had better discuss them and vote on them at the end of the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that would be the more satisfactory way.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEARNS. I think that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio was that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto should end in one hour. I take it that all of this talk is to come out of that hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. KEARNS. The motion was to close debate at the end of an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. No; that part of the debate that had reference to the point of order is not taken out of the hour either.

Mr. KEARNS. I am only speaking in reference to that particular motion. The motion was that all debate close within an hour; it was not that there could be one hour's debate.

The CHAIRMAN. If the floor is occupied without debate, of course——

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I have not had an answer to my inquiry. What is the ruling of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair is that debate consists of speeches made definitely and formally upon the question at issue.

Mr. KEARNS. But that is not the motion——

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of all such motions.

Mr. MONDELL. If the Chair will allow me, there was a reservation on the point of order, and during that reservation the gentleman did discuss the merits of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be taken out, of course, but the discussion of the point of order itself is not to be taken out of the hour. There are to be twelve 5-minute speeches, as the Chair understands by the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, for and against the amendment or against the bill.

Mr. KEARNS. That is not the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the ruling of the Chair, whatever the motion was.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I made a motion which I will repeat again in a somewhat modified form now—that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] be voted on at the end of five minutes' additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a motion to that effect?

Mr. BEE. May I ask the gentleman——

Mr. GARD. That gives the five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BEE. I have no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know if the gentleman from Indiana is present or not——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Here I am.

Mr. BEE. I am not going to discuss the merits of this bill at this time, but I am going to discuss the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. In doing so may I be permitted to state that there is no pleasanter recollection of my boyhood days than the recollection of the old negro family servants of my father around the family fireside; the recollection of the fidelity, the truth, and loyalty portrayed to me by my people of the action of these old slaves during the trying days of the war, when the men went away to battle and the women and children were left under the protection of these people in absolute safety? I do not approach this question in any sense of race discrimination. I want to suggest to my friend from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] that what we do not want in this country is a race question, and the gentleman from Indiana himself raises the race question by his amendment. Let us see——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Do I raise any more of a race question than I do a sex question or a religious question?

Mr BEE. We might as well be honest about it, one with the other. We know and the gentleman from Indiana knows that this amendment is not introduced because he is afraid that some Roman Catholic, or some Episcopalian, or some Baptist, or some Methodist, or some man of the Hebrew persuasion will not receive the benefit of this measure. The gentleman from Indiana knows that this measure is not introduced because he is afraid some unfortunate girl whose arms had been taken off in a factory or who had been injured in the field is not going to receive the benefits of this measure.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman think any discrimination, then, should be made against a man because he is black?

Mr BEE. No, sir.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Then why does the gentleman object to this amendment?

Mr. BEE. Because the gentleman has raised that very issue himself, when nobody else has done so. In the State of Texas, where I have been a member of the legislature, we have provisions that there shall be no discrimination in the distribution of public money. If this law is passed and is carried into effect, those same provisions will apply against the discrimination on account of color. Let me say to him that whenever we build a schoolhouse in Texas for white children we build one equally as good for the negro children. When we employ a teacher and fix the salary in a white school, we employ a teacher and fix the same salary in the colored school.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I understand that is true in Texas, and I understand it is true in North Carolina, but unfortunately there are States in the South where that is not true.

Mr. BEE. The gentleman is begging the question now.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I am not begging the question. I am stating the situation.

Mr. SEARS. I wish to say that the situation suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] is true in the State of Florida.

Mr. BEE. In Texas we have institutions for imbecile children. We provide the same institutions for negro children as for white children. Let me say that in the constitution of the State provision has been made for the care of the insane, for the care of the blind, for the care of the deaf and dumb, and we carry the same provision for the negro as for the white people. The Southern States are taking care of the negro. Let the Northern States do half as well and all will be well.

This amendment ought not to be adopted in this bill, because it is not necessary and is known not to be. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the committee's attention to the committee amendment that was adopted the other day—the first amendment. I assume there will be a separate vote in the House on this amendment, and I do not think it ought to be adopted, for the reason that if the amendment is adopted a farmer who has worked 8 or 10 hours a day from practically the entire year may be hurt in going to town or on the way to a picnic or after the day's work is over, and would not have the benefits of the bill, whereas a tramp who has worked only one day and happens to be injured on that day would come within its provisions. Again, if a man who works in one of the industries of the country, and who labors practically all the time, happens to be injured while he is taking a little recreation or a little trip to some place of amusement he would be deprived of the benefits of the bill, whereas a man who had done very little work and who had happened to be employed three or four days would have all the benefits of the bill.

Now, as originally drafted the benefits of the bill accrue to every man who is injured in industry or otherwise, whereas under the amendment that was adopted by the committee they are limited to certain industries. In providing the funds to support institutions that would be created under this bill you will provide the funds by general taxation upon every man. If you are going to limit the benefits to certain industries you ought to tax only those industries. That is the theory of the compensation law.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. PARRISH. Is it not a fact that the bill introduced by Senator SMITH, known as Senate bill 18, and passed on the 23d of June this year, has the very wording that you suggest?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; I understand that it has.

Now, the primary purpose of this bill is not to protect any particular industry, but it is to provide that wrecks who fall by the way, the men who are injured, shall not be a charge on society but shall be made an asset to society. I submit that a workman who happens to be injured in an automobile accident or in taking some form of recreation, if he loses a leg or arm, is just as much a charge on society as if he had been injured by a broken piece of machinery.

Now, it is recognized in all the laws we pass in this country that recreation is just as essential, or practically so, as work itself. That is the theory and the basis for the eight-hour day, and, in fact, of all of the legislation that has been passed that is beneficial to the workmen of this country. And if it is true, then we ought not to say that because a man happens to be injured in one way he should and in another he should not have the benefits of this bill.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. SIEGEL. Does the gentleman know of any State that has adopted the provision that he is urging now?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I know the Senate adopted it, and the committee itself, when they first took up this bill, wrote into it that provision, and then when the committee came into the House and presented this bill they offered an amendment which would limit its application. When we come to a separate vote in the House, we ought to vote in the original provision by defeating the committee amendment.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, that the State of Minnesota has a bill which is in the very phraseology of the original act.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I thank the gentleman for the information. If the legislation is enacted at all, it should be general in its application. If the committee amendment remains in the bill, it will deprive the agricultural sections of many of the advantages of the measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I have prepared, and submitted, and called to the attention of the chairman four amendments. I will ask the Clerk to report the first and last amendments that I have submitted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LONGWORTH). Without objection, the amendments will be reported as requested by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 7, after the word "arts," insert "which disability was not caused by the willful misconduct of the person disabled."

Mr. GARD. I will ask that the last amendment be read, which embodies the same principle.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 4, line 6, after the word "duty," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "but such courses for vocational rehabilitation shall not be available to any such civil employee of the United States whose disability was caused by his own willful misconduct."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in offering these amendments I am following the basis given by the present compensation law of the United States as passed by the Sixty-fourth Congress, and which is found in Public Document No. 267, where the payment of compensation to a person injured in the course of employment or in the performance of duty—the two terms being used together—is made unless the injury is the result of his own willful misconduct. I have embodied that in these two amendments. I do not desire to discuss the matter further, since it is very apparent.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. In case a man should be crippled by reason of his misconduct, as you say, then there would be no chance for him in the future if he repented or wanted to do right. He would have no opportunity to get an education.

Mr. GARD. It is not a question of repenting or wanting to do right. It is just a question of the extent to which you want to carry this bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; surely.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend and colleague that this matter was discussed in the committee, and it was not accepted, because the bill was written upon the principle that it was an economic proposition for the Government. Even though the crippling was the result of a man's own negligence, he should be rebuilt anyway; and the majority of the committee decided to omit that particular limitation. It was discussed in the committee quite extensively.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. I just want to ask one question.

Mr. GARD. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to ask if the language the gentleman suggests is taken out of the soldier compensation act?

Mr. GARD. No; it is taken out of the compensation act for civil employees, passed in the Sixty-fourth Congress.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. If that is the prime purpose, the animating purpose, of this bill, I would like to ask why the original amendment was made?

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] can answer that. I do not know.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the second amendment I have offered be reported for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 3, line 5, after the word "used," strike out the words "by any institution for handicapped persons."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I move that that language be stricken out, because I do not think the language of the bill carries in its real meaning the use of any money by an institution. It is true that the only way that it can be done is that the institution may be dealt with by the boards, the State boards, in some of their corrective measures, in their measures of rehabilitation. The phrase "used by any institution for handicapped persons" seems to me to mean used by the institution itself, and I am sure that is not contemplated. I also have in mind the expression "handicapped persons" as being extremely liberal and one to which almost anything could apply.

Mr. BLACK and Mr. KALANIANAOLE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Hawaii.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Hawaii offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KALANIANAOLE: Page 1, line 10, after the word "States," insert "and the Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. It is not germane to the bill, which provides for rehabilitation in the States. If the gentleman desires to discuss it, I will withhold it for the present. I will reserve it.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I would like to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Hawaii is recognized.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Chairman, it has been interesting to me to listen to the debate that has been going on concerning the rehabilitation of these cripples and also as to the amount of appropriations made for the extermination of diseases in animals, and so on. I was just wondering if you gentlemen realize that Hawaii is a part and portion of the mainland. Hawaii is the only full-fledged Territory left, and I see no reason why the Territory of Hawaii should not be included in any benefits that may accrue from bills that are brought up in the legislative Halls.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman, and if we pass any measure at all of this kind I would vote for such an amendment to include the Hawaiian Territory. But is not that a matter which should be provided for and considered by the Committee on the Territories?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I do not see any reason why I should go to the Committee on the Territories on a general bill of this kind. I understand that we should go to the Committee on the Territories if a bill to this effect applying only to Hawaii has been introduced. I am now asking the House of Representatives to include Hawaii in this measure. Perhaps the Committee on Education may run off with the idea that Hawaii is a place only where they have hula skirts and play the ukulele under the palms, and so on. [Laughter.]

But I want to say to you, gentlemen, that Hawaii has its industries. It has its sugar-cane raising, and there is no country on the face of the earth where the raising of sugar has reached a higher point scientifically than in Hawaii. It has its pineapple-raising industry and other industries. Why should not the people who are working in these industries be entitled to the benefits of this bill? [Applause.] I see no reason at all. You are excluding us from them, yet at the same time you want us to pay taxes to help the people of the States. Do you call that justice? [Applause.] Do you call it right that we, the citizens of the Territory of Hawaii, shall pay for the disabled men of the States? If you eliminate us from the benefits of this bill, for goodness' sake eliminate us from paying taxes for the benefit of the disabled people of the States. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. We have omitted to give these benefits to Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Porto Rico and the Philippines are possessions, but Hawaii is a part of the mainland and a full-fledged Territory. [Applause.] Hawaii came into this Union under a treaty of annexation. It did not come to this country under conquest. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I will.

Mr. FESS. I think there will be no danger that anything desired by Hawaii that it ought to have, in the line of vocational rehabilitation, will be denied by the Committee on the Territories, which is in charge of legislation for Hawaii. That is the proper committee.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. The proper committee, I believe, is the Committee on Education.

Mr. FESS. The Committee on Education has not jurisdiction of matters in Hawaii.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Absolutely. Why should I go to the Committee on the Territories when this bill was considered and reported out by the Committee on Education?

Mr. FLOOD. Should not Alaska be included if Hawaii is?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Hawaii may have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not possible under the agreement. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to make any extended remarks on this point of order. I think the point of order is clearly well taken. The bill is to provide vocational rehabilitation for men in the States. It makes no provision for the Territories. All legislation in respect to our Territories, under the rules of the House, should be reported from the Territorial Committee. Clearly the bill seeking to provide for vocational rehabilitation for persons living in the States does not admit of amendment to provide vocational rehabilitation for persons living in the Territories. I therefore submit that the Chair should sustain the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Hawaii desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I do not think the point of order is well taken. This bill is not particularly for the States, so far as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will observe that in line 10, page 2, the Territories, outlying possessions, and the District of Columbia are specifically excluded from the population ratio. Under those circumstances, the Chair is inclined to think that the point of order is well taken, and the Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment which I would like to have reported at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 2, amend the committee amendment which has been adopted by striking out, in line 4, the figures "1920" and insert "1921," and on line 6, strike out "1921" and insert "1922," and in line 7, strike out the figures "1922" and insert "1923."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order, for reasons that I will endeavor to state in the five minutes I have under my control.

The committee amendment adopted when this bill was last up for consideration says that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $500,000 shall be appropriated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Authorized.

Mr. BLACK. Authorized. We are now already well into the present fiscal year. This bill only authorizes an appropriation for the present fiscal year. It does not make a direct appropriation, and if the bill passes now it will be at the next regular session of Congress before the appropriation will be embodied in the proper annual appropriation bill. I dare say it will be well into 1920 before the appropriation will be available. Therefore I think the authorization should provide that the first appropriation shall be made for the fiscal year which begins June 30, 1920, rather than the one which ends June 30, 1920. What brought this matter to my attention was the debate on the Smith-Hughes vocational bill. We took that up on January 2, 1916. Of course, we all know that the fiscal year 1917 had then begun. When the bill was up in January, 1916, that matter was brought to the attention of the chairman of the committee, Mr. Hughes, by Mr. LENROOT, now a Senator from the State of Wisconsin, and I quote from what he had to say:

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the chairman of the committee with reference to the date in this bill as reported. It was reported to the House on February 12, 1916, nearly one year ago; and very properly the dates named in the bill at that time related to the fiscal year 1917. In view of the present situation and the condition of the Treasury, I want to ask the gentleman whether he does not think all of these dates ought to be moved forward one year?

Mr. HUGHES. I will state to the gentleman that I had intended to offer that amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman make that motion?

Mr. HUGHES. I will offer that amendment, that all the dates be moved ahead one year, that 1916–17 be made 1917–18 and 1925 be made 1926.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent that all the dates be corrected.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask unanimous consent that they be moved forward one year.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hughes] asks unanimous consent that the bill be so amended as to move up one year the various dates set forth in section 2. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will allow me, there was a good deal of difference as to the length of time involved in that measure and in this one before the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. BLACK. There was a difference in the point of time of the passage of the bill, but in the point of time for the appropriation it will be the same, because the gentleman will undoubtedly agree with me that if we pass this bill now there will be no money appropriated for the purpose until the next session of Congress, and I dare say the appropriation will not be available until within three months of the close of the fiscal year. Therefore it seems to me that every common-sense consideration argues for the proposition that this bill authorize the first appropriation to begin July 1, 1920, which would be for the fiscal year of 1921.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama make the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not feel like exercising the prerogative of the chairman of the committee on that matter, if the chairman of the committee believes the point of order ought not to be pressed.

Mr. FESS. I think we ought to press the point of order. I do not want to argue it in the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very clear that the amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I will offer another amendment in lieu of that, which I think is in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after the word "employment," in lines 3 and 4 as amended, strike out the language "for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $500,000." And on line 18, same page, after the word "section," strike out the language "for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $66,000."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 7, after the word "act," strike out all of line 7 and line 8 down to the semicolon and insert "and the Federal board shall furnish to the State board general plans and specifications and such other information as to the best method for training which they may be able to furnish."

Page 3, line 8, after the word "board," strike out all down to and including the semicolon in line 17.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, if the first amendment should fail, the second amendment is useless and should not be adopted. Therefore I will not offer the second amendment if the first amendment is not adopted.

Mr. Chairman, I dislike to offer amendments, being the ranking Democratic member of the committee, because during the consideration of the bill I was compelled to be absent on account of serious illness in my family. Therefore I trust the committee will not misunderstand or misconstrue the motive that impels me in offering the amendments I have offered.

No one is more ready and in accord with legislation to meet the needs of the cripple than am I; no one appreciates the aid of the Government in rendering these people assistance more than myself. But I contend, and shall continue to contend, that the money we appropriate for that purpose should go for the purpose intended, and not be spent in salaries, in many instances, of some people holding positions, taking it away from the people we intend to help and from the aid that Congress intends to give them. It may be contended that, because the Government gives Florida one dollar for each dollar that Florida gives to these people, Florida ought to bow her knee and go to the Government for plans and specifications. On the contrary, I should say that Florida or any other State that has been carrying on this work and has made advancement along the line of rehabilitating the cripples—the Government should go to that State. Why should New York and Massachusetts, which will spend enormous amounts of money along this line if this bill becomes a law, report to the Federal Government and be estopped from putting into effect any system of theirs which does not receive the indorsement of the Federal board in Washington?

I believe that each State is better capable of handling this proposition than is the National Government. I believe the members of the State board are more in touch with the cripples of that State, and that they are as philanthropic as the Federal Government. I think they better understand local conditions. If you pass this bill as it is written, mark my prediction that much of the appropriation will be spent in salaries, and, in fact, more than will be spent in the States in rehabilitating the crippled people.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I have read the gentleman's amendment, and it seems to me that his amendment denies to the State the plan to be adopted and puts it in the hands of the Federal board—the very thing that the gentleman does not want to do.

Mr. SEARS. The amendment was hurriedly drawn, but I think if the gentleman will read it carefully he will see that he is mistaken. If, as stated by the report, there are 280,000 cripples, and each should apply for assistance, each one would receive less than $4 per annum, while many people, unless my amendment is adopted, will be receiving $2,500 and more per annum in salaries. Certainly this House does not intend to do that, and I therefore trust my amendment may be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks that have just been made by my distinguished colleague, the former chairman of the committee. He states on his own responsibility as a legislator on the floor of the House that the States understand the needs of their cripples better than does the Federal Government, and I agree with him.

Let us see what the bill does. I regret to differ from my distinguished colleagues who champion the bill. The bill does not provide the money for the establishment of a single institution to rehabilitate a single cripple. This bill finds no new source of money supply. It goes to the pockets of the American taxpayers for every dollar. We can not deceive ourselves, and the time is coming when the American people, who are paying the taxes, are going to ask us why we are continuing to put on the backs of the American taxpayer these unnecessary Federal employees. Let us take a common-sense view of it. There is only a certain amount of money that the people can put up for the rehabilitation of cripples.

Is not that a sound proposition? Everybody must agree to it. That money can come only from the pockets of the American taxpayers; whether you get it through Federal or State control, it comes from the same pockets. What do we do in this bill? I charge this, and I do it respectfully, against the committee that brings in the bill: They propose that for every dollar the humanely disposed American people are appropriating through the Congress for the cripples of this country they will take out 20 cents the first year for Federal administrative expenses, taking it away from the crippled men and putting it in the pockets of the Federal employees created by this bill and for their expenditure. There is not a man here that can successfully deny that. In the future, upon every dollar that the people are devoting through the Federal Treasury to the rehabilitation of these cripples you will take 15 cents and put it in the pockets of these Federal employees, and into their expenditures, that do not teach a single one of these men nor help them to rehabilitation. I can not see the common sense in the method of procedure provided by this bill. This is what is proposed, and gentlemen will not deny it. We propose to go to the people of a given State, for instance, and get from them, under our system of Federal taxation, their share of the money authorized by this bill to be appropriated, and we bring that money to Washington. Then we send back to them their proportional share under this bill. But for every $120 which we get from them we send back to them only $100. We charge them $20 on every $120 for bringing the money up here and sending it back and for acting as overlord in telling the people who put up the money how they shall spend it. These Federal employees are toll takers, who stand along the pathway where the American people are trying to put their money into the rehabilitation of crippled manhood and take $20 out of every $120 and put it into their own pockets or apply it to their own expenditures. [Applause.] Talk about the politics of it! We ought not to consider that; but the time is not far distant when we shall go home to our people, who are now feeling the burden of direct Federal taxation, and they are going to ask us, "Could you not trust your State? Why are you duplicating the machinery of government and putting upon our backs the salary of unnecessary officeholders who live up in Washington?" You will have to answer that question, and you ought to have to answer it.

I have voted for a good deal of this sort of stuff, and I have voted for a whole lot more of it in the past than I am going to vote for in the future. The States are equipped to do this work. I say to my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS], that he has put himself in an attitude, by his amendment, with all due respect to his ingenuity, his judgment, his fidelity to his country, and his ability as a statesman, where under his own words he has no right to take the money from the cripples of America and put it into the pockets of a lot of new officeholders in Washington.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What does the gentleman mean by taking it from the cripples and putting it into the pockets of people in Washington?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I mean there is only a certain amount of money—the gentleman must agree there is a limit upon the money that the American people can pay for the rehabilitation of their cripples, and when you take from that limited, inadequate amount $20 out of every $120, as you propose to do, the first year, and leave that $20 in Washington to pay the salary and expenses of these unnecessary Federal officers, you take that money from the cripples who need it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the logic of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] seems to be that the best way to solve a national problem is to do it in piecemeal fashion, with 48 distinct and separate plans. I disagree entirely, for this great work of human salvage means changing a national liability into a national asset. Why should not America assure the worker in her industries, who enters a daily fight with modern machinery, that his injury will not be his despair but that he will be given a fair chance to begin again? The greatest problem before any nation is that of developing all its resources to the utmost. Here is a chance to take men who would otherwise be derelicts and burdens upon society and make them self-supporting, self-respecting members of society.

Mr. Chairman, during this entire debate, opponents of this bill have vigorously used the argument of economy, of Government interference with private matters, of bureaucratic extensions of power.

It is exactly the same arguments used against every new idea that seeks to put human rights above property rights. On the plane of the State legislature this same battle has been fought out in the past in almost every State in this Union on even so fundamental an issue as the public-school system.

I could not help comparing, during this debate, the similarity of arguments used against this bill with those urged in the Pennsylvania Legislature against the public schools long ago, and Pennsylvania was one of the first States to establish an all-embracing school system.

It was a long battle. The colonial charter and the constitution of 1776 had no reference to schools. The constitution of 1790 made provision for schools for paupers, but few would take advantage of an opportunity with such a stigma upon it.

In 1834 the legislature passed a law providing for an optional school system, and each school district was required to vote as to whether it desired it or not. At the first election 592 districts accepted it and 485 rejected it.

Then, the issue was joined, and one of the most bitter battles in legislative history followed in the next session of the legislature.

The opponents came forward with their arguments of economy and their declaration that education is a private matter. They declared that such action was an infringement of the rights of the individuals and that it was sure to result in confiscation of property.

The State senate at once repealed the act of 1834 on the arguments of these objectors. The bill went to the house, where it wavered in the balance until a young man from Gettysburg, Thaddeus Stevens, took the floor. He made one of the most masterly speeches ever delivered on the subject of public education. He admitted that it was a new idea, but declared that it was not dangerous simply on that account. He declared that by the very law of self-defense the Commonwealth should protect itself against an army of ignorance, which would threaten free institutions.

By a vote of 50 to 30 the House amended the bill, and provided for a complete system of public schools on the principle that every child is entitled to an education. The Senate was forced to accept the amendment or have all legislation fail, in either event the public-school system being continued.

That fight has never had to be made since, and Pennsylvania is to-day expending $50,000,000 a year for its public schools.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have very little time, but I will yield.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Pennsylvania settled the matter, and you have the public school.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; Pennsylvania did settle the matter in spite of every obstacle. She decided that education and development were matters of government, and that no argument of economy should prevail. And I want to say further that just as no sane man to-day opposes the idea of free education for every child, so the day will come when the same general and universal acceptance will be given the idea that it is a governmental duty to restore and reeducate and rehabilitate every worker crippled in industry.

Mr. Chairman, with other Members of this body, I had the privilege last summer of visiting the largest rehabilitation hospital in England. I went through the shops where 1,800 men, every man a cripple, lacking an arm or a leg or an eye, and in some cases both legs or both arms, were being trained.

I saw those men being remade, learning new trades, adjusting themselves to artificial limbs and appliances.

The thing that impressed me above all others was the eagerness with which they displayed their new accomplishments. They would work until the perspiration poured from their faces in showing how they could use the spade or hammer or saw. Underneath every act was the joy of men who saw light ahead, where they had thought all was darkness. That was the explanation. They had known despair. They had had visions of dependence on charity. They had faced the terror of unemployment, helplessness, and vagrancy. They had found the way out, and the result was so apparent that one of our party remarked "This is the happiest place we have found in England."

Mr. Chairman, I have seen that same thing in Walter Reed and other rehabilitation hospitals in this country. We have recognized the fact that the crippled soldier, injured in his country's cause, is entitled to every assistance in becoming a self-supporting, self-respecting citizen. Let us go one step further and recognize that the soldiers of peace, victims of the carnage of industry, are also entitled to their chance to become developed citizens instead of derelicts. The money spent in these two lines of human betterment will be about the best ever spent by America. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, the opponents of this measure first took the position that it was unconstitutional. That is the argument of the lawyer who goes into court with a weak case. They have abandoned the unconstitutionality of the measure and they have put themselves upon the plea of economy. You need not worry about the next Congress or the Congresses after this being for economy. The American people will take care of that proposition. You need not disturb yourselves about what appropriations the next Congress is going to make, because, in my humble judgment, Congresses elected in the near future are going to be those who stand for economy.

I feel that this question is not a question of how much money you appropriate to-day. This is forward-looking legislation. This measure is legislation that is going to come. Whether it comes in this Congress or not, it is going to come. This legislation looking to the building up of American manhood is bound to come, and every day I walk down the street and see a cripple standing on the corner, crippled in industry—industry which makes our civilization—when I see him it is to me an indictment of our Government and of our civilization.

But I repeat to you, whether you adopt this measure or not, it is going to come. I had the temerity to offer an amendment to the bill that carried $640,000,000 to the aircraft program to reduce the amount to $320,000,000. I was the only Member of this House who had the temerity to offer that amendment, and I could not even get a corporal's guard at that time. Yet you talk to me about economy; talk to me about economy here, when it is to educate and rehabilitate these men who become cripples in industry. Why, Mr. Roosevelt said once that civilization owed it to the family of the man who went down, whether by his own fault or not, to see that they were cared for, because, he said, if it cost human life to make sugar, and you must have it in your coffee and tea, you ought to pay the full price, and that his family should not want. [Applause.] No, gentlemen; there is nothing in this argument of economy. It is false economy; it is not sound economy. Take a man who can not take care of himself and is a drag upon society, and you take him and make him a being that can earn his own way. Who cares for these cripples to-day? It is the red-blooded, generous American. I believe in making the man who will not help go along with the fellow who is generous and helps to take care of him. Who is taking care of them now? Society. Society bears the burden; and is it not more just to let every man carry the burden rather than put it upon the neighbors in a neighborhood to bear the burden? Somebody has to do it. Are you willing to let the burden rest upon a few generous individuals or are you willing to come and face this proposition like American statesmen ought to face it and say that you will start this movement? So far as the camel's nose getting in the tent is concerned, the camel never sticks his head in the tent except to get out of a desert sandstorm; and gentlemen who are not willing to place this character of legislation before the several States will be hunting tents in which to stick their heads before the next election rolls around. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in all probability what I have to say on this proposition will be like carrying snow to Lapland or coals to Newcastle. I never did possess the happy art of expressing myself felicitously while compressing my ideas into a few sentences. I shall endeavor, however, to express myself as felicitously as circumstances will permit on this great, great matter, in my judgment. I do so for the reason, Mr. Chairman, that from the day I tottered out of my cradle my attitude toward human existence was that of a sympathy and a consideration for the struggler, for the toiler, for the fellow whose youth bore no flower in its branches, whose hopes burned into ashes away, and I desire to run true to that form during all the course of my lifetime.

This great bill has been assailed from five or six different standpoints. The method of attack first resorted to was as to its constitutionality; but, apparently, this assault met with no great response in this House, and it was hastily dropped. Then came the suggestion that the passage of this bill would give great joy to the reds and soviets and agitators of this country. It created a snicker for a moment, and was just as rapidly dismissed, because within the United States of America, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, all of the agitators of this country who could become a menace could be rolled into one patrol wagon and brought to the calaboose. Finally, State rights were raked into the fight, and you know State rights has taken a shift from its old fortress and has found champions in States that looked upon that doctrine as anathema some years ago. Then came the old, old favorite argument that has been hugged to the soul of every fellow who believes in property rights and is willing to forget human rights; that it is the greatest extravagance. And, finally, from the gentleman from Indiana we have the method adopted 2,000, yes, 3,000 years ago, of the Trojan horse. Troy is to be sacked and pillaged and put to the flames by a cunning device. The bill is to be defeated by loading it down with an amendment that will cause its destruction. The proposed amendment is a device that is calculated to arouse antagonism against the Roman Catholics of the South, to arouse prejudices and apprehensions as to the race question, and all with a view of arraying the Members from the Southern States against this bill. Clever, shrewd, adroit.

I hope that the assumption on which it is based is erroneous. I trust that we are too enlightened to be prejudiced against the adherents of a great church; that we are too generous to be unfair to the members of a race, black though it be, with whom we have dwelled for generations.

So far as I am concerned I am willing to vote, and shall vote, for any amendments to this or any other bill the purpose of which is to bring our people religiously and economically into close and harmonious relationship. But I will oppose this amendment as unnecessary, as uncomplimentary to the section whose assumed prejudice it is apparently intended to overcome solely, and I say this with all possible deference to the gentleman who has offered it, offered solely for the purpose of loading the measure with an amendment that will cause it to totter to its destruction and fall. I am as willing as any man in this country—and trust I will never change that attitude—to help the black man from his prostrate position, just as I am glad to extend my hand to my white brother when he goes down in the smoke of industrial battle.

And right here let me say that I am amazed at the position of the champions of protective tariff on this bill. I am amazed at men opposing this measure who have stood on this floor and championed the passage of tariff measures—measures that have built up our industrial system into Olympian heights and have made the owners of these industries so rich and great and powerful and strong that they have become known through an appellation that signifies power, vast wealth, financial control, and social dominance. I am staggered at the reflection that the overlords and barons of our country can command the passage of laws which enable them to create wealth, build up palaces, and accumulate millions more than they could possibly need to supply their earthly wants, while the worker, the toiler, the doughboy, the trench man has to beg for an obole and not secure it for fear that it will anger the captain of industry, who looks down upon us from his imperial castle—

Crowns and arches for the Cæsars,
Let their brows the laurel twine.

But to the dungheap and the hillside with the down and out, the broken victim of this tremendous industrial activity—

Rattle his bones over the stones,
He is only a pauper whom nobody owns.

Fine linen and purple for Cæsar—no hope from his country for him whose arms and legs were torn from him in the industrial upbuilding of that country.

Up, up with the barons; down, down with the vassels and tenants!

On the floor of this House you shout that your dominating interest in the tariff is to protect American workmen. Show your sincerity. Vote for this bill. You claim that great riches have gone to the captains as an incident to the main purpose—protection to American wage earners. Evidence your sincerity by striking a blow that will help to his feet the man that has gone down to death's door for your theories and who has to make the end of the trail in sorrow and suffering, denied his limbs, his sight, with night and gloom his companions until the grave offers surcease—the only nepenthe that is left for him—oblivion and mother earth. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LONGWORTH). The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the first amendment.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The present Chairman was not present when this agreement was made. He will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] whether the agreement contemplated the right to offer amendments after the expiration of the time?

Mr. FESS. All amendments ought to be reported before we begin the debate on them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Amendments can not be denied at any time.

Mr. FESS. They can offer them, but not debate them.

Mr. MACCRATE. I did not desire to debate it, but simply to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MACCRATE: Page 3, line 9, after the word "Board," strike out the word "for," and on line 10 the word "approval."

The CHAIRMAN. Does any other gentleman desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. LANKFORD. I have one, but I want to offer it after the others have been voted down or voted them up.

Mr. TOWNER. I suggest the amendments be reported seriatum and read for the information of the committee before they are voted on.

Mr. GARRETT. Let one be read at a time and then voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARRETT. Is it in order to inquire if this has been submitted to Mr. Will H. Hays? [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. May I answer the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana) there were—ayes 39, noes 40.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. WOOD of Indiana and Mr. FESS took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MADDEN). The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS: Page 3, line 7, after the word "Act," strike out all of line 7 and line 8 down to and including the semicolon and insert the following: "and the Federal boards shall furnish to the State boards general plans and specifications and such other information as to the best methods for training which they may be able to furnish."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FESS), the committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEARS. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS——

Mr. SEARS. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman. That has already been provided for in a manner to do away with the necessity for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MACCRATE: Page 3, line 9, after the word "Board," strike out the word "for" and in line 10 the word "approval."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "mechanic" and insert the word "mechanical."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the chairman of the committee whether this amendment should not be adopted? The word "mechanic" is evidently an adjective there.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule adopted there can be no debate.

Mr. BLANTON. I was just asking the chairman the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In any State the legislature of which does not meet in 1919 or 1920 if the governor of that State shall accept the provision of this act, such State shall be entitled to the benefits of this act until the legislature of such State meets in due course and has been in session 60 days.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 5, line 6, strike out the figures "1920" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1921."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] a question with reference to the latter part of that section. The bill provides, "Any State the legislature of which does not meet in 1920," and so forth, "shall be entitled to the benefits of this act." The State obtains the benefits of the act even if no legislation is passed?

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will note, in line 9 of page 4, a provision requires the legislative authority to accept this act. If the legislature does not happen to be in session, that State would be, under the provisions of this bill, deprived of the benefits of the act unless we made a provision that the acceptance might be made by the governor. I will say to my friend that this language is exactly the language of the Smith-Hughes Act, to take care of the State of Alabama, which did not have its legislature in session.

Mr. GARRETT. How can the governor of a State make an appropriation for the State?

Mr. FESS. The governor could not do that.

Mr. GARRETT. To get the benefits of this act the State authority has to put up dollar for dollar, does it not?

Mr. FESS. Yes; that is with the State, and not with the Federal Government.

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman from Ohio called attention to the fact that that situation existed in Alabama at the time of the enactment of the vocational bill?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman state what arrangements were made?

Mr. FESS. Yes; arrangements were made authorizing the governor of Alabama to make acceptance instead of the legislature.

Mr. GARRETT. I guess the governor of the State would have no authority to bind the State.

Mr. FESS. I think not; but my friend will remember that our friend Abercrombie was on the committee, and it was adopted to cover this case upon his recommendation.

Mr. ALMON. I remember I assisted in working out the plan to get the benefit of that appropriation.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] has moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question along the line of the questions propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. Suppose the State has not legislated on this subject at all. How can the governor accept the money for that State when he has nothing to accept the money on? What would he do with the money? And then suppose at the time the legislature met in 1921 it did not adopt any such law. What, then, would it do with the authorization you make?

Mr. FESS. The legislation provided here depends upon the State accepting the benefits. The original plan is to have the legislature do it. If the legislature is not in session, but if the State, through its governor, can meet the requirements of the law, it will not be denied the benefits.

Mr. BEE. But suppose, under the constitution of the State, there is no such power vested in the governor?

Mr. FESS. Then they could not do it.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman, before he presses that point, yield to me?

Mr. BEE. I do not want to lose my time. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio this further question: I notice where you say "in those States where a State workmen's compensation board, or other State board, department, or agency exists, charged with the administration of the State workmen's compensation or liability laws, the legislature shall provide that a plan of cooperation be formulated between such State board, department, or agency, and the State board charged with the administration of this act, such plan to be effective when approved by the governor of the State." How can there be a plan of cooperation between a workingmen's liability law instituted for the purpose of compelling the corporations that work their men to provide for them an insurance in case of injury and a vocational course for them in case they are injured?

Mr. FESS. One of the difficulties in this legislation that caused the committee to refuse to accept this legislation as an amendment on the soldiers' disability or rehabilitation act was that the soldiers' rehabilitation act was purely Federal, and the rehabilitation of industrial cripples would be cooperative and done through the States.

Mr. BEE. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. FESS. I will answer it. There are 38 States that have State compensation commissions.

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. We do not want to direct the rehabilitation of any cripple in a State through the State board provided for in this act without the cooperation of the State compensation commission, because the compensation commission has to do with the payment of the compensation to cripples, while this has to do with the training; and while the training would be by the State board, on the approval of the Federal board, there must be cooperation between the State board and the State compensation commission.

Mr. BEE. Now, let me ask the gentleman this question: Suppose a man who is entitled to the privilege of rehabilitation under this act has been the victim of a personal injury by a corporation. Is there anything in this law that will entitle the corporation to set off against his recovery for personal injuries the fact that the Government has provided for his rehabilitation?

Mr. FESS. Most certainly not.

Mr. BEE. Why not?

Mr. FESS. The compensation pays the man because of the injury, and this trains him to put him in a position, not to take his compensation away from him. The compensation will go on, but we train him in order to be a factor in production after the compensation has ceased. The one is paid under the authority of the State, the other is paid by authority of the State in cooperation with the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I desire to oppose the paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not a member of the committee entitled to recognition first?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he is.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to get only one matter clear.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED] a member of the committee?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I am not.

Mr. BLANTON. I will take only a few minutes. This bill provides that dollar for dollar must be appropriated by the States before the Federal Government can pay one single cent toward this fund. Now, in the face of the above, what is the use of such a provision as that in this second section, which provides that where a State legislature does not meet in 1920 or 1921, then the governor of that State may accept this provision, and it shall be in force until 60 days after the legislature shall meet? What is the use of acceptance by the governor of the State if the money can not be paid? Does aceptance provide the means by which the money shall be paid over to the State and may be used and expended? If it can not be paid over and used and expended, what is the use of paying it over? Why not wait until the legislature meets, and in proper form, in accordance with the provisions of the bill, and with the proper safeguards that the bill places around that money, shall appropriate the duplicate amount of money? I think this provision should be stricken out of this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. If the governor makes acceptance, then the board can make the apportionment, and when the funds are provided then apportionment can be made available for the purpose. That is all it does.

Mr. BLANTON. But what is the use of making the apportionment until the money is appropriated? The money will not be available until the legislature meets, because the legislature is the only power in a State that can appropriate the money of the people of that State. The governor can not do it any more than the President of the United States can appropriate money.

Mr. TOWNER. But the apportionment can be made ready for the acceptance of the State when the funds can be provided.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the use of apportioning to a State until the State itself makes an appropriation? The State might not see fit to appropriate as much as the apportionment?

Mr. TOWNER. Then it could not be used, that is all, but it would be ready if the governor accepted it.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the provision should be stricken out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED] has given us some very interesting facts. Without in any way attempting to cast any reflection upon the statements that he has made, I submit that if they are true they are exceptionally interesting, and I have no doubt that as far as Federal activity goes, if this bill becomes a law, the administration of it will be placed in the hands of just such men as those who have figured out that some people are worth a certain amount of money from the soles of their feet up to the neck, and that from the neck up some of them are worth $10,000. But I do not imagine that if they get an individual who is crippled so as to consist only of that portion of his anatomy that is comprised in that space occupied from the neck up that he would contribute very much to the advancement of science or industry in this country.

That is not what I rose to say, however. I want to ask the distinguished chairman of this committee a question with reference to subparagraph 3 of section 2 and to ascertain if it is proposed to tell the legislatures of the States where they have compensation boards and where they have also complied with the vocational-education act that notwithstanding they are complying with the law with reference to vocational education and have a vocational-education board in the State, yet it shall provide through the legislature that the workmen's compensation board shall cooperate for the administration of this law and not permit the vocational-education board of the State to participate in the execution of the plan which this Federal board provides?

Mr. FESS. The administration of this law will be under the State board of education upon the approval of the Federal board, but when we enter the States that have compensation commissions we are not giving all of the administration to the education board, which might conflict with the State compensation commission, but we deal as a Federal Government with the State board, and in those States such as the gentleman has suggested, and his State is one of them, whatever cooperation is to be reached must be reached by the authority of the State, and the authority is the legislature. Therefore, in the State of Massachusetts and in the State of Ohio and in many other States, 38 in all, the administration of this particular law will be by the cooperation of the State board and the State compensation commission.

Mr. WALSH. So that we do say to the Legislature of Massachusetts and to the Legislature of Ohio and any of the other States that it shall provide a plan of cooperation, even though the State might prefer that the entire administration of this act should be confined to its State vocational education board.

Mr. FESS. We require just the same as we require that the benefits be accepted by the legislature or the governor.

Mr. WALSH. But you do require that the legislature shall provide that a plan of cooperation shall be established, even though that State might prefer to have this act administered through its vocational education board, regardless of the State compensation board?

Mr. FESS. We do. Vocational education is one thing. That is under the State board of education. The rehabilitation of a cripple touches on the subjects receiving compensation, and we would not give all authority to the State board of education; neither would we give it to the State compensation commission; but a cooperation between the two, as provided by the legislature.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good interest to gentlemen who appear here in advocacy of this measure, and in so far as I can observe their argument in favor of the bill is based upon a profession of interest in the men who are crippled in industry in this country. The issue can not be joined there. I understand, of course, the attitude of those who are in favor of the absorption of all governmental power by the Federal Government, who are seeking to destroy the efficiency of the States. When a man stands on the floor of this Chamber and says that the particular matter under consideration is one over which the States have complete legislative jurisdiction, and with regard to which they have the complete power to deal, he is charged with not favoring the subject matter, as not being in favor of remedying the evil which the bill under consideration seeks to remedy.

Now, let us see what this bill proposes to do. I watched my Democratic colleagues; I counted them. When the distinguished gentleman from Florida offered his amendment to place the administration of this fund within the States' control I watched the vote, and in so far as I could observe every Democrat on the floor stood up and by his vote registered it as his judgment that the States should control. There is but one way on the face of this earth for that to be done, and I challenge the legislative experience and the common sense of my colleague, and that is to leave this matter to the State. I say to you, my friend from the South, I say to you Democrats who, by your vote on the Sears amendment, declared to your country and to your colleagues that you believed the States ought to control. I say to you, my friends, that there is a wisdom in the philosophy of government which puts the necessity of government as close to the people as you can get it. I say to my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, it was a fortunate day in Pennsylvania in its struggling with the problem of free schools that the Federal Government did not step in and relieve the people of Pennsylvania of the necessity of dealing with that question. It is only through a struggle that men grow strong, and since the formative period of government progressed government has been in that direction which has put not the right but the necessity of government as close to the people as you can get it. [Applause.] The time has come, my countrymen, when we have to put the brakes on. The time has come in this country when we must put the responsibility on the State. To vote for this measure carries a charge against the States, I can not make anything else out of it, and against the legislatures of the State that they will not do justice to the cripples within their borders. You say by your vote that you must take the money out of the pocket of the people of your State, because they will not through their legislature vote to rehabilitate their cripples and that you must send it back to them through a Federal body of overlords who will charge 20 per cent on the money taken from the pockets of your people to rehabilitate the cripples within their respective States——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. FESS. I have great respect for my friend. Is not the argument he is offering now applicable against many appropriations of money out of the Federal Treasury to do things down in the gentleman's own State?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is impossible in five minutes to discuss the wisdom of legislation that has been passed. This bill is before the House, and I say to the gentlemen that Members of the Congress when they confront the responsibility of voting on a given measure must reflect their judgment upon that measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I do not have any difficulty in supporting this bill. In fact, I do so with a great deal of enthusiasm. I think it is one of the best pieces of legislation that has been brought before this Congress. As between human rights and property rights, I am for human rights. I am for all progressive legislation, and I refuse to stand with my back to the wall and with no vision for the future. It is too late now to advance the argument that all such legislation as this ought to be left to the several States. I hope that every State in the Union has enacted wise legislation along this line. My own State has a compensation commission that carries out the provisions of the law enacted for the benefit of those injured. If there is any State in the Union that needs stimulation, north or south, it ought to be stimulated by the Federal Government.

Three arguments have been used against this bill. The first is that of economy. I am heartily in favor of economy in every branch of the Government. Every appropriation ought to be closely scrutinized and not a cent of the people's money should be taken by the taxgatherer in excess of the urgent needs of the country. We are not justified, particularly under present conditions, in appropriating a dollar for any purpose for which there is not great necessity, but as the committee reports there are about 300,000 cripples in the United States, shall we not do anything for them? If the various States have wisely provided for them, certainly the stimulating effect of a Federal vocational board will not do any harm, but under the influence of this board additional humane legislation will be enacted for the cripples of the country. These industrial cripples will be rehabilitated like thousands that became disabled during the last war. They will be trained to earn a livelihood, and instead of being an economic loss they will be a great asset. Therefore, I believe that it is economy to use the services of so many cripples throughout the Nation.

This bill appropriates for the first year $500,000, or about one-half a cent for each of the 110,000,000 citizens of the United States. Certainly no one would begrudge giving this much to rehabilitate the unfortunate and give them encouragement and hope for a brighter day. If these people can be assisted, so that they will fit into various positions where they can make a living, it will be money wisely spent. If the States are enacting legislation along this line, this law will only be a stimulant. In my judgment it will be helpful. While I am for economy, I refuse to begin with the cripples of the country.

The next argument used is that it is not constitutional. It is used in nearly all debates where a Member wants to defeat legislation. I find no constitutional inhibition against this appropriation. Of course, I would not vote for it if it were clear to me that it violated any provision of the Constitution, but none has been pointed out. While one would be free to use the Constitution against the opposing counsel in court, I refuse to use it in an argument on legislation of this kind.

The argument most frequently advanced throughout this entire debate is that it is a matter for the several States. I have already referred to this and what my State has done, but let us see if we have all been consistent in using the argument of State rights against the cripples of the country.

I have before me the Agricultural appropriation bill approved July 24, 1919. I want to refer to a few of the items and invite some of my friends who have been earnestly urging that the States alone ought to look after their own unfortunates to some of these amounts. On page 7 of the bill I find that we appropriated $641,045 to fight hog cholera. I think this is splendid legislation. I heartily favor it. I am sure many of the gentlemen who are against this bill voted for the appropriation in the Agricultural bill. The hog is placed above the human, and the moral is, "You had better be a hog." On the same page of the Agricultural bill there is an appropriation of $741,980 for the eradication of the southern cattle tick. This is a fine appropriation, but if we can appropriate money to eradicate the cattle tick in the various States of the Union I do not find any difficulty in aiding the work of rehabilitating the cripples of the country. In the same bill we appropriated $220,728 for the study and control of the white-pine blister rust. This item applied and was used in the various States growing pine. I do not criticize it. I only invite attention to it.

We appropriated $452,505 for the study of cereal diseases and the improvement of cereals. This work is largely done throughout the various States. I voted for it. I believe the appropriation is fully justified; but if we can appropriate for the study of diseases of cereals, certainly there ought not to be any objection for appropriating money to rehabilitate human beings. I invite your attention to the item appropriating $304,050 for the prevention of the spread of the gipsy and brown-tail moths. This is a large appropriation, and I am not very familiar with it. I am sure that I would rather vote for an appropriation to encourage the poor and unfortunate cripples of the country than to prevent the spread of "gipsy and brown-tail moths." There is an appropriation contained in the Agricultural bill of $645,040 for meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil. I was heartily in favor of this legislation. I believe the Government ought to make this appropriation. I do not believe it is extravagance. I believe it is practicing economy. This money is spent throughout the various States, and if we use it for combating the cotton weevil, then the question of State rights ought not to be urged against us when we want to help the cripples of our land. The same is true of the agricultural-extension act, where the sum of $720,000 is appropriated. I do not believe there is a better appropriation made by Congress. I have always enthusiastically supported it. However, if we can appropriate money to be used in the various States to grow vegetables and farm products, then we would be justified, in my judgment, in using money to aid cripples in earning a livelihood. There is another appropriation of $397,240 to stamp out the pink boll worm. This is largely used in the one State of Texas; and yet we have gentlemen upon the floor who will vote for an appropriation for this purpose and yet decline to vote anything for the cripples of the country. This legislation is along the same lines as the Smith-Hughes vocational-training act, for which in the aggregate several million dollars have already been expended and more authorized. The act assists the various normal schools in the States throughout the country. Certainly, if we have the authority to assist the able-bodied men and women to secure a better vocational education, how much more is it encumbent upon us to extend relief to the unfortunate for whom there is no ray of hope. Three or four years ago we passed what is known as the good-roads act.

The first year we appropriated $5,000,000 and continued the appropriation until $25,000,000 was reached. This money is being distributed through the various States, much after the fashion of the bill now under discussion. Many gentlemen had no difficulty in voting for that bill, but some decline now to vote for a similar appropriation much less in size, for those who have been so unfortunate as to have lost an eye or a limb. Recently we supplemented the good-roads law by adding as an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill the sum of $200,000,000.

Another item in the Agricultural appropriation bill is for $2,500,000 to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease. Everybody agrees that this was wise legislation, and no one, so far as I know, opposed it. By spending Government funds, the disease was checked and our live stock was saved. It resulted in a large economic saving. I favor the economic saving of human beings also.

I am for this humane legislation and shall vote for it, although I will vote to cut down some of the appropriations for administrative expenses of the law and reduce the salaries, when that section of the bill is reached. If I did not, I would throughout all future time be ashamed to meet a cripple on the streets selling shoestrings or lead pencils. Let us stimulate the States to do their full duty to this class of citizens. If it were not for the good women of the country urgently presenting all causes for charity, the churches, and the like upon the men, everybody knows that they would not receive the proper financial support. The various drives for the Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Young Men's Christian Association, and other welfare organizations during the war netted large sums, but how much would have been contributed to them, if the drives had not been put on and the people appealed to and aroused to a sense of their duty? This legislation has for its purpose the stimulation of the various States by the Federal Government in such a way that they will do their full duty in restoring these cripples and making them an economic asset instead of a liability to the State and Nation. Every community is interested in bettering its citizens, and every State is so interested, and the Nation as a whole is interested in the happiness, contentment, and productive capacity of every citizen in the Union.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 2½. That no person or corporation alleged to be liable in damages for disability incurred by another shall be permitted to plead or allege the benefits of this act in mitigation of damages."

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is already closed on this section and all amendments to the section.

Mr. LANKFORD. But I offer it as a new section.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment. If the gentleman desires to discuss it, however, I will reserve it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, has it not been ruled several times recently that a new section can not be offered and debated after debate has been closed on the previous section?

Mr. BLANTON. It can not be offered as an amendment to the section under the agreement heretofore entered into by the committee.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed.

Mr. TREADWAY. That would be against the rule. I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The amendment is not germane to the section or to anything else in the bill. Does the Chair understand that the point of order of the gentleman from Texas is against the amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; against the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did not the gentleman from Georgia submit a unanimous-consent request to proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. He did; but the Chair, under previous rulings in the committee, did not recognize the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. If the Chair will permit me, I hope he will take time before he rules that a new section offered as an amendment would come under the rule closing debate on the previous section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. That makes the question academic, of course.

Mr. BLANTON. Regarding that, Mr. Chairman, it was decided by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and has been decided at numerous other times.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Federal Board for Vocational Education shall have power to cooperate with State boards in carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act, and is hereby authorized to make and establish such rules and regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to carry into effect the provisions of this act; to provide for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their return to civil employment and to cooperate, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, with such public and private agencies as it may deem advisable. It shall be the duty of said board (1) to examine plans submitted by the State boards and approve the same if believed to be feasible and found to be in conformity with the provisions and purposes of this act; (2) to ascertain annually whether the several States are using or are prepared to use the money received by them in accordance with the provisions of this act; (3) to certify on or before the 1st day of January of each year to the Secretary of the Treasury each State which has accepted the provisions of this act and complied therewith, together with the amount which each State is entitled to receive under the provisions of this act; (4) to deduct from the next succeeding allotment to any State whenever any portion of the fund annually allotted has not been expended for the purpose provided for in this act a sum equal to such unexpended portion; (5) to withhold the allotment of moneys to any State whenever it shall be determined that moneys allotted are not being expended for the purposes and conditions of this act; (6) to require the replacement by withholding subsequent allotments of any portion of the moneys received by the custodian of any State under this act that by any action or contingency is diminished or lost: Provided, That if any allotment is withheld from any State, the State board of such State may appeal to the Congress of the United States, and if the Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid it shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. WALSH, Mr. GARRETT, and Mr. LANKFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. I move to amend the section, page 5, lines 18 and 19, by striking out the words "and private."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 5, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "and private."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 31.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 6, line 9, after the word "portion," insert:

"Provided, That no deduction from the allotment to any State shall be made until one year after the legislature of said State shall first meet after the passage hereof."

Mr. STEVENSON. I think the chairman will see the justice of that. The provision is made here that they shall deduct each year from the allotment the part which the State has had on hand and has not expended the year before.

Now, under the provision on page 5, where the governor may accept the terms of this act, and if the State becomes entitled to it, the governor can accept and allotment will be made; but no money can be spent until the legislature meets and appropriates.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will yield, I think his amendment might cover an exigency that might arise. I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as it is my purpose to vote against this bill, I desire at this time to state some of the reasons that actuate me in so doing. I do not know that I shall contribute any new thought to the debate, but I shall at least have the satisfaction of again laying before this body certain principles applicable to legislation which has been passed here in the past and which are involved again now.

This is another of those unfortunate measures predicated, in my opinion, upon wholly erroneous conceptions of the functions of the respective governments under which we live. It has been said by those advocating this bill that the opponents of the measure have continuously harked back to the doctrine of State rights. Mr. Chairman, I am not ashamed, in any case where the doctrine of State rights applies, to utilize that argument. A million men offered their lives for the principle of local self-government, as they conceived it. Unnumbered thousands of them died for that principle. Other unnumbered thousands of them suffered wounds and torment for the sake of their convictions. I have never felt called upon, Mr. Chairman, to apologize for living by that for which my fathers died or offered to die. But, sir, in frankness let it be said that in the sense of an imposition upon State rights that doctrine is not here applicable. Nor do I contend it. The only way in which the rights of the States are involved here is that there is involved in this measure a certain degree of moral coercion. Of course, the States are free to take the benefits or the burdens of this act, as the case may be, or leave them alone, as they may choose. But what I would emphasize, and what, if I have interpreted correctly, has been the thought which has run through the minds of those who have argued against this bill before us, is the importance of adhering to State duties. I have looked for the time to come—and I think it will come, gloomy as the outlook now may seem—when the popular thought of this country will demand the performance of State duties by the States; will stop this continuous cry which comes up on every governmental proposition that is offered or thought of, of "On to Washington! On to Washington!" [Applause.]

It is not an unnatural thing that the demand for Federal appropriations has grown to such an extent in this country. It has been due, Mr. Chairman, to the indirect system of taxation that has been enforced by the Federal Government. The hand of the tax gatherer has been concealed. The individual in States knew when he paid his State taxes, because he walked into the tax collector's office and paid out the cold cash and received only a tax receipt in return. But he has been paying the Federal taxes when he bought his clothing, when he bought his tobacco, through the instrumentality of the internal-revenue duties and the duties collected at the customhouse. Who was it—Burke, I think it was—who said, "If you could but hide the hand of the tax gatherer you could tax an Englishman down to the last rag of his clothing and to his last crust of bread without occasioning a protest."

What has been the result? The result has been that the people in the States, not knowing when they paid their Federal taxes, came to regard appropriations out of the Federal Treasury as so much got instead of so much spent. As I have said before in this place, discussing legislation similar to this, when the member of a State legislature goes home his constituents meet him with a cold gleam in the eye and say to him, "How much did you spend?" But a Member of Congress returns to that same constituency and is met with the same cold gleam in the eye, but the question is, "How much did you get?"

That, Mr. Chairman, is going to be changed. Why? Because we have reached that point in our Federal expenditures where you can no longer raise even a fourth of the amount by indirect taxation. It has to come by direct taxation. Where the man will feel it and know it when he pays it, he is going to inquire a little more carefully into what it has cost to administer the funds appropriated by the Congress of the United States.

I have always believed, independent of any question of State rights, that Mr. Calhoun was correct when he laid down the principle that whatever can be as well done by the States as it can be done by the Federal Government should be left to the States for performance, and that the arm of the Federal Government should be extended only when the arm of the State government can not—not will not, but can not—reach. I believe in that principle to-day. I know, and every intelligent man who has been observant of Federal expenditures knows, that the administration of this act under the Federal Government will cost the people of this country infinitely more than it would cost if administered under their respective State governments. [Applause.]

What are we coming to? We used to argue, back in our schoolboy days, the question, "Resolved, that the signs of the times indicate the downfall of the Republic." That was one of the old, old questions. I never thought that they did. But I have wondered again and again during my experience as a Member of Congress whether we were not approaching with greater rapidity than we realized that point where the administrative functions of the Federal Government are to bear down and destroy the very substance of the Republic's structure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield to a request?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. I have an amendment to the text that I wish to offer.

Mr. FESS. After the gentleman from Tennessee has closed. That will take care of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. I object. Does that 10 minutes include me?

Mr. FESS. Ten after the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LANKFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak 10 minutes on this bill at some time.

Mr. MACCRATE. I have an amendment. I have not spoken on the bill. I have sat through the entire discussion. I object to that 10-minute limitation.

Mr. WINGO. I object for the present. Let the gentleman from Tennessee get through.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. I object for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the principle of this bill is wrong. If this is a Federal function, if it is a thing which the Federal Government ought to do, then the Federal Government ought to go forth and do it and not depend upon the States. If, upon the other hand, it is a thing which the States can do as well as, if not better than, the Federal Government, it ought to be left to the States to perform.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. In a moment. It ought to be left to the States to perform, because bear in mind, gentlemen, that whether it is done by the State government or done by the Federal Government the same people must pay for it.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield now for a question?

Mr. GARRETT. In a moment. And Federal administration will cost infinitely more. I have heard gentlemen on that side of the Chamber complain much of the bureaus that have been built up here in Washington during the last six or seven years. Here you are starting a perpetual bureau, which will absorb out of the appropriations for its administrative officers and its office forces sums that we can scarcely compute now.

Mr. DOWELL. Did the gentleman take that position in the appropriation of money for good roads?

Mr. GARRETT. I did. I said then substantially what I am saying now. And if it interests the gentleman, let me say it was made the principal issue in a candidacy which I had at home for renomination. My position was sustained by my people. [Applause.] The people of my district are not mendicants at the door of the Federal Treasury. [Applause.] They believe in running the Government in the most economical way that it can be run.

I am raising no technical question here, no abstractions such as gentlemen even from the South have sneeringly referred to in the course of this argument as State rights. I am arguing this from the cold standpoint of a practical business man. I know, and you know, the inevitable effect of this is to increase tremendously a bureau here in a department in Washington. Why, you provide that there must be uniform rules sent out from Washington to govern this matter of rehabilitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. I object.

Mr. FESS. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 42, noes 41.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 6, line 17, after the word "State," where it appears first in the line, strike out the balance of the line, and all of line 18, and down to and including "paid," in line 19, and in lieu of the language stricken out insert "for a period of two years after the appropriation is made."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the language as now contained in the bill says:

Provided, That if any allotment is withheld from any State, the State board of such State may appeal to the Congress of the United States, and if the Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

If my amendment is adopted the language will read:

Provided, That if any allotment is withheld from any State for a period of two years after the appropriation is made, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

I think an amendment of that sort should be adopted, because we know already that the State board or anyone else has the right to appeal to Congress. We do not need any statutory enactment to give a citizen or a board or anyone else the right to appeal to Congress, and I dare say they will appeal to Congress; but there is no definiteness in the language of the bill. It might be in one year, or two years, or four years, or five years. My amendment would provide that if this allotment is withheld from a State for two years after it has been appropriated, then it shall be covered back into the Treasury, because that would give Congress ample time to hear the State board, to take action upon it; and if it does not amend the act so as to give the State the money, then it will be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I should like to have some one explain what is meant by the language—

The State board of such State may appeal to the Congress of the United States.

Does that language give anyone a right that he did not have before?

Mr. BLACK. I called attention to that. The language does not confer any additional right at all. The State board may appeal to Congress, or any citizen may appeal to Congress.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It simply means the right of petition?

Mr. BLACK. That is what it is. I am not particularly committed to the idea of two years. It might be three years or four years, but some time should be definitely fixed when this money shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The language used is the language of the Smith-Hughes Act. That was put in because it was feared some controversy might arise where the Federal Government would withhold the money from a State for some reason; and if it should do it permanently—that is, if the Federal board should do it permanently—it would give the right of appeal to Congress and let Congress settle it.

As far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly willing to accept the gentleman's amendment, because I do not think any State is likely to jeopardize its right to use the money.

Mr. BLACK. Not within the period of two years. That will give them ample time; and it has the advantage of being definite and not to leave the time to speculation and conjecture.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have been much interested in the ingenious arguments that have been made to defeat this bill to rehabilitate the disabled men and women in industry.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] speaks of this as being purely a State function, and in his usual forceful and eloquent manner has emphasized the importance of State duties. It is a State duty, and, Mr. Chairman, with rare exceptions, the States have long neglected that duty. But the obligation of rehabilitating the industrial cripple also belongs to the Nation. It is a joint obligation, and, with the States, the Nation has for some years seriously neglected the performance of its obligation. So that in rising to support this measure, Mr. Chairman, permit me to stress national duties and their performance.

In enacting this legislation into law the Nation will not only perform its own obligation but will assist the States in doing likewise.

The objections as to this legislation being unconstitutional and outside the proper sphere of Federal legislation could be urged with equal force against every Federal appropriation for education, public health, and agriculture. Something like $26,000,000 was appropriated for educational purposes by Congress this last year. Thousands—yes, millions—of dollars are appropriated each year from the Federal Treasury to prevent cattle and hog diseases, and, in my opinion, wisely so.

In the early history of our country neither the States nor the Federal Government were called upon for legislation of this kind. Then as settlements grew up matters of education and the prevention of disease among cattle and hogs became a State legislative question. After 140 years of our country's history every part and portion of the country is dependent to a greater or less degree upon every other part, so that to-day the raising of hogs in the Middle West is of vital concern not only to the Middle West but to the citizen of the Eastern and Western States. If the farmer's cattle become diseased, not only he and his community are affected but the whole Nation.

In like manner has education become a Federal legislative question. And certainly, with the growth of industry, the disabling of thousands of workmen every year, thereby cutting short their producing power, is of concern not only to the workman and his family and to the community in which he resides but to the Nation as a whole. Changed conditions have made his welfare a matter of national concern. Congress is given power to legislate to promote the general welfare of the Nation. The general welfare requires that every man and woman be a producer. This bill will assist in making him one.

Numerous other objections have been raised which, with one exception, I will not attempt now to answer. It is urged that the measure may be all right, but following the Great War time is not opportune. In reply, I urge that now is the time. We have just won a great war.

There have been certain by-products to every war in American history. The Civil War was fought to preserve the Union. The great by-product was the abolition of human slavery. The Spanish-American War was fought to protect American rights and to free Cuba. One of the by-products was the acquiring of overseas possessions, with the accompanying responsibility of the care and civilization of several million inhabitants.

The Great War which has just ended will also yield its by-products. Its waste of millions of human lives gave us all a keener appreciation of the worth and value of a human life. It was man power that broke the Hindenburg line. It was man power that furnished the munitions and supplies and the ships that carried them. We were literally a "whole nation in arms." There was a place for every man, woman, and child, and all were mobilized. That was national efficiency.

The war is over and before us are the perplexing problems of readjustment. In many respects these problems are more difficult of solution than the "winning of the war." The waste and extravagance of war time must cease. To really make an impression upon the high cost of living we must produce more and waste less.

We all believe in the prevention of waste by the repair and the salvaging of material. Much was attempted in that line during the war. This Congress has also with credit to itself taken a great step forward in salvaging the human wrecks of the Great War by setting aside $80 a month for the rehabilitation of every disabled soldier. We have said to them that if possible, notwithstanding the injuries or disability received, they are to be made as economically free and independent as their country in whose defense they sustained their injuries.

This we have done out of love and gratitude, yes; but also for economic reasons. Several thousand maimed American soldiers are now in training and many other thousands will be.

But back of the man in khaki and in support of the American "doughboy" was the American workingman, who not only mobilized for the war but had been mobilized for industrial purposes for many years preceding the war. What this Congress is doing for the maimed and disabled soldier of our American Expeditionary Forces it ought at least to aid in doing for the disabled members of our industrial army. I urge this not only upon humanitarian but economic grounds.

Our wounded battle casualties in the American Expeditionary Forces were 230,000, of which about 100,000 can be rated as severe. Figures are not yet available as to the number that were permanently disabled. Compare this with our industrial losses per year. In one year of peace in our industrial army there are 2,000,000 casualties, of which 875,000 involve disabilities of over one month's duration. Of this number 75,000 involve loss of hands, arms, legs, fingers, or eyesight. In other words, in one year's time the losses in our industrial army were eight times as great as the total battle casualties were in the American Expeditionary Forces during the whole war, and bear in mind that this goes on year after year.

Many of these men are so injured that they can not go back to their occupation.

This figure of 2,000,000 does not take in those disabled in industry from disease.

What is the result? The efficient workman upon being disabled ceases to produce. The family man ceases to take care of those he was formerly able to take care of. Finally, the compensation fund is drawn in full and we find those others whose care he is naturally and legally charged with are forced to take care of him. Unable to care for himself he becomes a burden to others, being dependent he ceases to be able to act as an independent citizen. If a family man, thereby charged with the support of others and unable to do so, he sees the education of his children neglected and their future power as producers curtailed, thereby carrying the handicap into the next generation.

In this measure the Nation recognizes its joint debt with the States of the Union to the crippled industrial worker and signifies to the States its willingness to join with them in assisting in the rehabilitation of these maimed and disabled industrial workers. To every dollar contributed by the State the Government pays another dollar. For a precedent we have only to refer to the Morrill Act, originally introduced by Senator Morrill, of Vermont, in 1857, passing both Houses of Congress, but being vetoed by President Buchanan. It was again introduced in 1861, passed both Houses of Congress again, and received the sanction and approval of Abraham Lincoln in 1862. The State Agriculture and Engineering School received its start from this famous enactment carrying the name of the Vermont Senator. Then there is the Smith-Hughes educational act, which passed the last Congress, providing for Federal aid in vocational education of normal men and women. But why search for a precedent? A crippled and disabled workman is a loss not only to the State in which he resides but to the Nation to which he owes allegiance. The Great War has demonstrated the extent to which the Nation's life depends upon its workers. The crippling and disabling of one of them is of concern not only to his dependents but to the State and to the Nation. That is precedent enough.

The gentleman from Missouri, the distinguished ex-Speaker of this House, in his remarks against this bill spoke of his support of Federal legislation to reclaim by drainage and irrigation waste and desert lands. We have heard much during the past few years of the necessity of the conservation of our oil lands, water power, forests, and other natural resources. I agree with the gentleman in the wisdom of such legislation, but I go further and urge the passage of this measure, which conserves that which is more important—the Nation's man power.

In times past Congress has appropriated large sums of money to reclaim arid and desert lands. Let this Congress appropriate a smaller sum to reclaim to a life of social usefulness to the Nation its disabled industrial workers by restoring to them the power of self-support. I urge in this period of readjustment that Congress perform its duty and permit the Nation to clean up the scrap heaps and waste dumps of modern industry. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this section and amendments thereto is closed. The first question is on the amendment.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. I move to strike out the word "two" and insert the word "three," as many of the legislatures only meet once in four years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALMON to the amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Strike out the figure "2" and insert the figure "3."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk.

Page 5, line 20, after the figure "1" in parentheses, strike out all down to and including the figure "2" in parentheses in line 23.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the certification of the Federal board as provided in this act, shall pay quarterly to the custodian of each State appointed, as herein provided, the moneys to which it is entitled under the provisions of this act. The money so received by the custodian for any State shall be paid out on the requisition of the State board as reimbursement for services already rendered or expenditures already incurred and approved by said State board. The Federal Board for Vocational Education shall make an annual report to the Congress on or before December 1 on the administration of this act and shall include in such report the reports made by the State boards on the administration of this act by each State and the expenditure of the money allotted to each State.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that the language in section 4, page 6, reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the certification of the Federal board, as provided in this act, shall pay quarterly to the custodian of each State appointed as herein provided the moneys to which it is entitled under the provisions of this act.

Do I understand that that language means that each State is to have a custodian appointed?

Mr. FESS. The State treasurer will be the State custodian.

Mr. WALSH. Why did not the committee provide that it should be paid to the State treasurer?

Mr. FESS. Because the Federal board administers the authority through the State board.

Mr. WALSH. What has that to do with the State treasury? It says "to the custodian in each State." I agree that if the States are going to embark on this proceeding they ought to have a custodian appointed for them, but I would like to know why it was not put into the hands of the treasurer of the State?

Mr. FESS. The act requires the States to appoint a custodian, which is the State treasurer, and he would be the one to administer the fund. The gentleman will find that language on the top of page 5, subdivision 5, that the custodian is the State treasurer, with whom the Federal board is dealing.

Mr. WALSH. That is, to appoint a custodian of said appropriation. It is not the custodian of the State. This is going to be paid to the custodian of each State, as herein provided, and there is no provision in here for the custodian of the State.

Mr. FESS. The State treasurer is the custodian.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It makes the State treasurer the State custodian.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I see what was intended, and I do not wish to quibble about it. I do not see why a State should be empowered by the act of Congress to appoint somebody else to take care of its funds. If it is the State treasurer, the act should provide that the money should be paid to the State treasurer, and not attempt to give him any new fanciful title which might appeal to some of the distinguished scientists who will administer this act. I do not think it would appeal to the rich man or the poor man, including some of the cripples, who will have to bear the burden of this legislation by way of taxation in order to meet the expenditures.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I expect to vote for this bill, and in view of the speeches made by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and the distinguished Republican floor leader [Mr. MONDELL], I feel called upon to make this statement. I am about as independent as anybody in this House, and I do not take orders from anyone. I am personally responsible for every vote I cast here.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Not now. I do not know Mr. Will H. Hays, chairman of the Republican national committee, and have not met him. I would not know him if he came in on this floor this minute. I have never talked with him about this or any other bill, and am not concerned about his views on this bill or upon any other bill. I cast my vote upon each bill upon the merits of that particular bill, uninfluenced by anybody. I vote in this House for what I consider right and against what I consider wrong. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to call the attention of the chairman to the language of the bill, with a view of asking whether he thinks it should be amended. At the close of the section on page 7 the following language occurs:

and shall include in such report the reports made by the State boards on the administration of this act by each State.

I call the attention of the chairman to the fact that there will probably be 48 of these reports, some of which might be of considerable length. It occurred to me that the language ought to be—shall include in such reports abstracts of the reports made by the State boards.

I do not think they ought to embody the whole report, as it might be a very voluminous document.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the idea of the committee was that the State boards should be required to report their activities to the vocational board, and then that that vocational board should be responsible to us and make a report to Congress. The idea was to report what is being done in the various States—not necessarily to be published, but to give it to us. I do not think there would be any special objection to making it an abstract, yet that would give a good deal of discretion to the Federal board. Our idea was to get into this body exactly what is being done in the State of Texas and in the State of Ohio and in other States.

Mr. BLACK. That is very true, but we already have stacks of Government documents that are never read, and if we leave this language in the bill we will have 48 State reports published as a supplement to the report of this board, which will make a very big document.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman think we ought to have voluminous reports?

Mr. BLACK. I think there ought to be abstracts of these State reports.

Mr. FESS. Where should the reports from the States be?

Mr. BLACK. They should be kept in the office of the vocational board, and that board should submit to Congress an abstract of those reports along with its report. Mr. Chairman, in line 7, after the word "report," I move to insert the words "abstracts of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 7, line 7, after the word "report," insert the words "abstracts of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 30, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 6, line 23, strike out the word "custodian" and insert the word "treasurer"; and strike out "appointed as herein provided"; and on page 7, line 1, strike out the word "custodian" and insert the words "treasurer of."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply seeks to provide that the money paid to the States shall go to the proper financial officer of the State by his proper title and does not change the meaning in any respect.

We are approaching the close of the consideration of this measure, and lest there be any misapprehension in the minds of my distinguished colleagues that my position has been changed by references made upon the floor by certain distinguished gentlemen, or by the appeals made to the accompaniment of the slow, sad music of humanity, I desire to say that I am still opposed to this measure and shall vote against it. I want also to say to those gentlemen who have referred to appropriations for the boll weevil, for the white-pine blister, and various other appropriations made by this Congress, that I did not support that measure, neither did I vote for it. If gentlemen will consult the RECORD, they will find that I was in a somewhat lonely and not distinguished minority of one when that bill was put upon its passage.

But I say that the gentlemen here in this Congress who have set upon the task of enacting legislation and who will in a few short months go back to the people of the land to report upon the manner in which they have performed their duties I believe are going to be met with the question, "What have you done to reduce the taxes and the burdens upon the people growing out of this Great War?" [Applause.] And I submit that I had rather defer acting upon these somewhat frantic appeals of the poor unfortunates—accompanied by demands made in the name of others who are not wholly and solely interested in the unfortunates, but more particularly interested in procuring a place upon the pay roll of Uncle Sam at salaries far outweighing the value of the services which they render—I say I prefer to say to my constituents that I have voted against appropriations for projects which might well be deferred until they have lessened somewhat the weight of the taxation that will follow the expenditures arising out of the war emergencies. [Applause.] And I do not fear that the verdict of the people throughout the land will approve the attitude of Members of this House, if that is what they are fearing, in going to the people for approval or ratification of their acts. So I submit, sir, as has been so well said before by gentlemen far more eloquent than myself, that the time is here now to set out upon a program of economy.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Let the States, these backward States that need stimulation—we are providing a new sort of stimulation, having wiped out by constitutional amendment and legislation alcoholic stimulation, and we will substitute for the States a stimulation in the shape of an appropriation from the Federal Treasury. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill, regardless of its crudities. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that Congress is attempting by this bill what it attempted in other bills, like the Smith-Hughes bill and other bills, to legislate responsibility and duties on State officers that are not vested in the State officers by the constitution and laws of the State, and I do not believe that they can do so. In this bill the governors of the States and the legislatures of the States are entirely ignored. All they are good for, it seems to be, is to appropriate half of the money and the governor to sign the bill. When you come to deal with a State you should deal with the governor and not with the treasurer, a subordinate officer, who is sometimes elected by the people and in some States appointed by the governor and in other States appointed by the legislature. I do not think we have any right to impose duties on State officers that are not vested in them by the constitution and laws of their State. The Federal Government should deal with the State governments through their governors, who are their responsible executive officers. Regardless of these crudities and the fact that I do not think a number of things in the bill are constitutional, I am going to vote for the bill to show I believe in the reclamation of human wrecks, just as I do in the reclamation of overflowed lands. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

A division was demanded.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 4.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That there is hereby appropriated to the Federal Board for Vocational Education the sum of $200,000 annually for the purpose of making studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their placements in suitable or gainful occupations, and for the administrative expenses of said board incident to performing the duties imposed by this act, including salaries of such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere as the board may deem necessary, actual traveling and other necessary expenses incurred by the members of the board and by its employees, under its orders, including attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations, rent and equipment of offices in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference, law books, and periodicals, stationery, typewriters and exchange thereof, miscellaneous supplies, postage on foreign mail, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, and all other necessary expenses.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment which will make the committee amendment unnecessary if adopted, and I desire to offer it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment comes first.

Mr. BLANTON. It is in the nature of a perfecting amendment which, if adopted, would make the committee amendment inapplicable.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendments are perfecting amendments and should be considered first under the rule. The Clerk will report them.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, after the word "hereby," insert the words "authorized to be."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 12, after the word "of," strike out "$200,000 annually" and insert "$100,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and annually thereafter, for the period of four years, $150,000."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to change the figure 1921 to 1920. It is a typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless objection is made, it will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman mean to authorize an appropriation of $100,000 to be used by this board for the remainder of the present fiscal year?

Mr. FESS. That figure is to correspond with authorized appropriations in the section preceding.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition as a member of the committee on an amendment that I have to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. GOOD. I wish to ask a question concerning the committee amendment. How was the sum of $100,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and the sum of $150,000 thereafter for the period of four years arrived at?

Mr. FESS. By the estimation of the administrative expense, which will at least require one director. It is estimated there will be at least four surgeons and there will be about 14 districts, which will follow the rules of the Smith-Hughes Act, making an assistant director at the head of each district, and then there is provision for making studies and investigations generally, taken from the other act, which carried $200,000 for the purpose, to make these investigations in connection with the Commerce Department and Labor Department and other departments of the Government.

Mr. GOOD. Was this the estimate of the Vocational Board?

Mr. FESS. They estimated $200,000. We cut it.

Mr. GOOD. Two hundred thousand dollars for each year?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Of course, for this year you are giving them practically their estimate, because this bill will not become a law until practically half the year has gone.

Mr. FESS. That is true. However, this was done back in June.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, to strike out the figures "$100,000," in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$50,000"; and in line 14 strike out "$150,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$75,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Amend the committee amendment, page 7, line 12, by striking out "$100,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000"; and on page 7, line 14, by striking out "$150,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$75,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I do not want it understood that I have changed my opinion in the least in regard to the desirability at this time of passing this kind of legislation. I think it is fatal. I think we ought not to do it. I think the party that stands for it and attempts to make a party issue of it will have something to answer for and will be sorry that it ever took that stand. I am absolutely opposed to building up these great bureaus with high-salaried officials, and if this amendment is adopted I shall move to strike out the $5,000 position and the $4,000 position carried in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the Vocational Board has already 1 official at $6,000 a year, 2 at $5,000 a year, 28 at not in excess of $4,000 a year, and 27 at not exceeding $3,500 a year, and 70 at $3,000 a year. I am opposed to indefinitely extending that sort of thing.

I submit it is not necessary to make this survey to the extent that is proposed here. It should be made by the respective States. I undertake to say it is not necessary to rehabilitate all the college professors in the United States that are worn out and to find jobs for them. [Applause.] And I am afraid that that is what this bill proposes.

I have here a letter received from the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he states that for the last fiscal year we received over $485,000,000 taxes on liquor. I am advised that for the month of August there were practically no receipts from such taxes. Unless that law is modified by presidential proclamation we will receive none.

I have another letter from the editor of a leading magazine, calling my attention to the fact that the New York Chamber of Commerce has gone on record in favor of limiting appropriations by Congress for the next fiscal year to $2,700,000,000, a thing that is absolutely impossible, no matter how economical Congress may be, even if it does not pass another law requiring appropriations. I stated several times, and I repeat now, that by the practice of the strictest economy, by not enacting a single piece of legislation that will require additional appropriations, I do not see how, for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1921, we can bring the appropriations much, if any, under $4,000,000,000. Where is the money to come from, I ask you who vote for this and kindred legislation at this time, desirable as it may be to help the cripples? Answer by your vote where you propose to get the money. A business man, before entering into a contract for the purchase of property, usually first determines the source from which he will get the money with which to discharge the obligation. If he has not the money, and does not know where it is coming from, he refuses to make the purchase. Some day Congress will be guided by the same principle. It will come, just as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] explained, from the taxpayers of the several States of the Union. But it will come in a different form. It does not come from all of them. These cripples should be rehabilitated by all the people of all the States. Every man who has property, whether he pays an income tax or not, ought to pay something for such a cause, and the only way to make him pay it is to have the States do those things that the States ought to do, and among those things which the States should do is the care of their indigent poor and the care of their injured and their sick. Every State does it now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill has been assaulted from every possible angle. There are those who feel that it is a work that ought to be done, but that the Federal authority should not do it; therefore it should be defeated. There are others who think that while we do make provision, we should pare it down to the very lowest minimum, so that if it can not be defeated on its merits it can be nullified in its effect.

The gentleman who has just now so eloquently addressed us [Mr. GOOD] makes as much noise over the most insignificant item of an appropriation as he does over the maximum appropriation for any governmental function. That is a fairly good characteristic. I remember that Mr. Gladstone said, "What I do I do with all my might, because it is not worth doing unless it entails all the strength that I have." I am concerned, gentlemen of the committee, not with whether this bill is going to pass or not, for I am satisfied it will become law; I am not particular, so far as I am concerned as author of the measure, whether the Congress passes it or not. It matters very little to me save my desire to see a constructive piece of legislation. It has to be left to the judgment of the Congress, and to this Congress which must take the responsibility of its defeat. It seems to me that it is a form of legislation that ought to receive a different consideration from what our membership has accorded to it. The character of the opposition must ever stand as a comment upon our attitude on a progressive measure.

I believe that it is the function of the Government to rehabilitate and rebuild the poor fellow who has lost any limb, who has come to be not only a wreck and a burden to himself, but a subject of charity on the public and under a hopeless despair, so far as he himself is concerned, a charge not only to himself but on the people. It is a wise provision to train him so that he can be self-supporting and make out of himself something, where before he was merely a subject of charity. And that is the purpose of this bill.

Now, so far as the amendment of my friend from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], who makes an assault on the whole bill, is concerned, I am not disturbed as to whether this maximum sum be given or not. What I want to avoid is the House passing a provision and then emasculating it to make it ineffective. The author of the amendment is an enemy of the bill and can not be considered favorably. It is true that the Federal board has the sum of $200,000 for this purpose under the Smith-Hughes Act.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. It is true also that it has a similar sum under the act for the rehabilitation of crippled soldiers, and I am rather in sympathy with the idea that at this time, for a year at least, it might be advisable not to make the maximum appropriation for the administration, although I have some fear that it may cripple the work.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman from Iowa would offer an amendment to make the first appropriation $50,000 and the permanent appropriation $100,000, I would be willing to accept it so far as I am concerned.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I think it has been the experience of every man who has served on an appropriation committee that when you put in a maximum the trouble is that every man who is administering that act comes and asks for the maximum.

Mr. FESS. That is true.

Mr. GOOD. That is the trouble.

Mr. FESS. We did cut the estimate down from $200,000 to $100,000.

Mr. GOOD. But I am a little afraid that they made it on the basis of these large salaries.

Mr. FESS. Will not my friend admit that whatever we had brought in here, he would have attempted to reduce it?

Mr. GOOD. I think if the gentleman had brought in just the amount estimated I would have questioned it.

Mr. FESS. We did not think that original amount would be required, and we cut it squarely in two.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman a question on a matter of information. I would like him to have another minute.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more, Mr. Chairman, to enable the gentleman to ask me a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is a provision here for the purchase of law books for these people. I noticed that was in the Vocational Board provision before, and the question that arises in my mind is, When are they going to buy enough law books? And what will they do with them when they get them?

Mr. BANKHEAD. As to that, I am going to move to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be divided.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment of Mr. GOOD to the committee amendment: On page 7, line 12, strike out "$100,000" and insert "$50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 14, strike out "$150,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$75,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Strike out, on page 7, in lines 14 to 17, the words "for the purpose of making studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their placements in suitable or gainful occupations,' and in lines 23 and 24 the words "including attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations," and on page 8, line 1, the words "and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference, law books, and periodicals."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, would not the gentleman prefer to offer that after the committee amendments to this section have been disposed if? That is the usual method.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We have not reached the committee amendments. I think we ought to perfect the text.

Mr. WALSH. The other way is customary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels impelled to rule that the committee amendments have not yet been disposed of, and that they are entitled to first consideration. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] will be pending. The question is on the committee amendment as amended by the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

"A full report of all expenses under this section, including names of all employees and salaries paid them, traveling expenses and other expenses incurred by each and every employee and by members of the board, shall be submitted annually to Congress by the board.

No salaries shall be paid out of the fund provided in this section in excess of the following amounts: At the rate of $5,000 per annum, to not more than one person; at the rate of $4,000 per annum each, to not more than four persons; at the rate of $3,500 per annum each, to not more than five persons; and no other employee shall receive compensation at a rate in excess of $2,500 per annum: Provided, That no person receiving compensation at less than $3,500 per annum shall receive in excess of the amount of compensation paid in the regular departments of the Government for like or similar services."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of the committee amendment, commencing in line 12, the following: "at the rate of $5,000 per annum, not more than one person"; and, in line 14, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "one."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 8, line 12, after the word "amounts," strike out the words "at the rate of $5,000 per annum, to not more than one person"; and, in line 14, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "one."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the committee amendment provides for one person at $5,000 and for four persons at $4,000 and for not more than five at $3,500. My amendment strikes out the provision for one person at $5,000, and would eliminate three persons at $4,000 per annum. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the friends of the bill will not allow this emasculation. We must have a director of this work, whose duties are different from the work of the head of the vocational board. We must also have some surgeons. It is estimated that for the whole country we ought to have at least four. It is absolutely impossible to get men of any recognition for the salary that is now written into this in the form of limitations, and if we are to pass the bill at all it would seem to me that we ought not to emasculate it and make it ineffective.

I hope the friends of the bill will not permit this to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were 58 ayes and 54 noes.

Mr. SEARS and Mr. BLAND of Indiana demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. FESS and Mr. GOOD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 63 ayes and 66 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That no part of the moneys herein authorized shall be expended for the publication, printing, or preparation of any magazine, paper, or periodical unless authorized by the Joint Committee on Printing."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this simply applies a little supervision by the Joint Committee on Printing in regard to the expenditure of this money for printing purposes. The Federal Vocational Board publishes a vocational summary. It is somewhat in line with the publication which conveys to a waiting world the information that each bouncing baby born into the world has an economic value of $90. It also contains poems on the order of "Mary had a little lamb" and similar works of distinguished authors, would-be poets, and literateurs. We have a Joint Committee on Printing, and in several appropriation bills we restrict the great appetite for publicity on the part of these bureaus, providing that the money shall not be used to print magazines, periodicals, or newspapers. I think we ought to say to this distinguished gathering which will administer most of the provisions in this act, and spend most of the money in gathering and rehabilitating broken-down pedagogues, who will get on the pay roll at salaries far in excess of those they have been accustomed to receive in their youthful years, and will have an opportunity to exploit some of their pet theories, that among the activities they shall not pursue will be that of country editor at the expense of Uncle Sam; that if they wish to publish a magazine or newspaper or periodical they must submit it to the Joint Committee on Printing the same as other activities do.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The amendment which the gentleman offers will not prevent the publication of the result of the research and the work of the board?

Mr. WALSH. No, sir.

Mr. FESS. I am in hearty sympathy with what the gentleman wants to do in stopping the publication of periodicals, and so forth

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment. Strike out the provision "at the rate of $5,000 per annum for not more than one person," and insert the following: "No person shall be employed at the rate of $5,000 per annum or more."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that in substance was voted on by the committee a few minutes ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee was to strike out and was modified by other provisions in the amendment. I am sure the Chair did not have that in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had that in mind.

Mr. GOOD. It is true the amendment was to strike out that provision, but included with it was a provision that only one person should be employed at $4,000 instead of four. I am inclined to think that when the vote was taken it was the judgment of the committee that the proposition might injure the bill by striking out three persons at $4,000. I do not believe that anybody will contend that injury would result by striking out the provision for the $5,000 position. I submit to the Chair that where the matter was tied up with other matters it could not be said that this matter was passed upon by the House, because it was passed upon with other matters providing for a salary of three additional persons.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Under the language the gentleman has submitted, could the board pay $4,999.99? If so, the amendment is meaningless.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to dispute the decision of the Chair. I offer another amendment, to strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert the figures "$4,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOOD to the committee amendment: Page 8, line 13, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$4,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD) there were—ayes 72, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. I would like to know how the bill will read with that amendment agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill as it will read with the amendment adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No salaries shall be paid out of the funds provided in this section in excess of the following amounts: At the rate of $4,000 per annum, to not more than one person; at the rate of $4,000 per annum each, to not more than four persons."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the following: "at the rate of $4,000 per annum each, to not more than four persons."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 13, after the word "person," strike out "at the rate of $4,000 per annum each, to not more than four persons."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this in regard to these amendments: Until a few years ago the district judges in my State, as I recall, were paid $3,500 per annum, and to-day they receive about $4,200 per annum. The governor of my State until a few years ago received only $5,000 a year; and never before, until this Vocational Board was established and until it commenced to make these raids on the Treasury, did we think of appropriating money as we have been appropriating it in fixing these salaries for low-priced men. On the Republican side of the House we have been denouncing the administration for creating new positions carrying high salaries, yet here we propose a plan to rehabilitate the college professors of the United States and give them higher salaries than the judges of the district courts in most of the States receive, and as high salaries as the judges of the supreme court in some States receive. The gentleman says that you can not get physicians. In the sundry civil appropriation act there is an appropriation for more than 100 physicians at salaries, as I recall, at less than $2,600 a year; and Gen. Blue says he is getting all of the capable physicians at that price that he wants. If we are going to economize, then let us quit talking economy while practicing extravagance. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the crime of being a college man I shall neither palliate nor deny. Any place outside of this Congress such a position is not a reproach. I do not put myself in the position of one who must be rehabilitated or resuscitated, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] declares to be the purpose of this legislation. If this bill is limited to the purview of the gentleman who has just spoken, namely, college professors, then we can afford certainly to defeat it entirely. But valuable legislation can not be defeated by mere meaningless declarations. That is not the purpose of the bill. The purpose of the bill is to aid the cripples who need rebuilding in order to free themselves from public charge. There are 700,000 who are crippled to the extent of four weeks' loss of time; most of them will not need help. But there are 22,500 who are totally crippled. It is true that if you scale that down to meet the compensation of the Federal Compensation Bureau there would not be the great number that have been detailed by the late John Mitchell and other witnesses who have appeared before the committee.

This bill was unanimously indorsed by the New York Congress of Safety Association, representing the employers of that State, the compensation commission of that State, and the Federation of Labor of New York. This congress in its last convention gave its unanimous indorsement to this bill. It was also indorsed by the National Manufacturers' Association and by the International Association of States Compensation Commissions. It has been indorsed by the various chambers of commerce and many business associations. It has been indorsed by the American Association for Labor Legislation, many State compensation commissions, and by many educational departments of various States. It has been indorsed by the Safety Institute of America and the Federal Compensation Commission. It has been indorsed by the tuberculosis association and dozens of other associations of the country. It is resisted and assaulted only here on the floor of the House by men who cry for economy and vote for every conceivable outlay save when to assist man to become a better man. They will vote for a million dollars amidst loud acclaim to take care of tuberculosis in cattle, "but, my God, I want to stop at doing anything for the poor human wreck who accidentally fell into a machine." [Applause.]

And if the gentleman arrayed against this measure can not defeat it on its merits, then he comes in when the measure is completed and attempts to emasculate it by making it impossible to administer the law that we pass. I hope the friends of this measure will not allow that. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the tremendous outburst of enthusiasm following the remarkable burst of eloquence of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio has a peculiar significance, because for the first time we have had it authentically stated upon the floor of the House that this measure is indorsed by the American Federation of Labor, and immediately there is an uproar on the part of those who seek to bask in the sunshine of Samuel Gompers [applause] and some of the other satellites who are down here now attempting to tell the Capital and the people of the country how the industries and the Government of the United States should be conducted. The responsibility does not rest upon the American Federation of Labor to provide the taxes which will be called upon to meet these appropriations and the responsibility does not rest upon the National Safety Confederation of the State of New York to provide the money to meet these appropriations. The responsibility will rest upon the people of the United States. The gentleman says that this bill is assailed only by those who plead for economy.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. This bill is also attacked by those who believe it is not the duty of the Federal Government to rehabilitate people injured in private employment and those who are handicapped as a result of accident and misfortune. I will yield to the gentleman for a question only.

Mr. SNYDER. I would just like to say——

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will ask a question I will yield.

Mr. SNYDER. I just want to make a statement of just about a half a minute——

Mr. WALSH. I can not yield for a statement; the gentleman can secure time.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. For a question.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Does the gentleman think anyone here who really wants this legislation put into effect, and put into effect effectively, would be justified in voting for this amendment?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman I will say yes, because you can get men to do this work at these salaries, and it is in line with the salaries paid to a vast number of other Government officials doing work of equal importance.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I say this bill is opposed by men who say it is not a part of the duty of the Federal Government to rehabilitate people injured in private employment, and they cite the land-grant colleges and these various other appropriations that have been made as a precedent. Why, those were based upon an entirely different principle than upon the principle which is sought to be invoked here; and, as I said before, if you start on this appropriation—many of us here perhaps will not be here to see it, but some of you Members will—you will see when we will come to be called upon to appropriate not a paltry million dollars of money, but many, many millions of dollars for this purpose, and when we will be called upon to appropriate money for the dependents of the cripples who have been injured in industries and furnish them with medical attendance and medicine at the expense of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Is not a motion to rise in order at any time?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not a Member entitled to recognition?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has been recognized.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to correct a statement that has been made by the gentleman in charge of the bill. So far as one member of the Manufacturers' Association of the State of New York is concerned, usually since I have been in this House, when the Manufacturers' Association of the State of New York have indorsed any measure, my attention has been called to that and I have been asked to take action upon it. So far as I am able to state no vote has been asked of me as a member of the Association of the Manufacturers of the State of New York with regard to this measure.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman know F. W. Keough?

Mr. SNYDER. I do not know that I do.

Mr. FESS. Representing the American Association of Manufacturers?

Mr. SNYDER. I am not a member of the National Association of Manufacturers. I am speaking of the manufacturers of the State of New York.

Mr. FESS. The national association is what I refer to.

Mr. SNYDER. And so far as I know the State association has not indorsed this measure.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT. Would it be strange if the manufacturers had indorsed this measure?

Mr. SNYDER. No; I do not think it would be strange by any means.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment in this particular, so that the amendment will read "at the rate of $3,600 per annum each to not more than four persons."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the suggested modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GOOD modifies his amendment so that it will read: "On page 8, line 13, after the word 'person,' insert: 'at the rate of $3,600 per annum each to not more than four persons.'"

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner suggested.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. I suppose the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] is opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to withdrawal of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the figures "$4,000," in line 14, and inserting the figures "$3,600."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that you can not take out a figure that you have put in once and do it by piecemeal, as the gentleman is now doing, as he took out "$5,000" and then took out "$4,000." I think the Chair was correct when he ruled that could not be done.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. GOOD. In line 13 the committee have stricken out the figures "$5,000" and inserted "$4,000." Now the figures "$4,000," in line 14, have not been stricken out. They stand as the committee amendment, and I am offering to strike them out and insert "$3,600."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken against the amendment.

The question was on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition on the amendment. For the first time and only in the consideration of this bill have I heard any assault on hog cholera, the cattle tick, the bollworm, and all of these other pests that have been referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and others, and I shall be very much interested in looking up the record of these gentlemen who are now depreciating the fact that appropriations have been made for such purpose to find out when they took the floor and offered amendments to strike out such provisions in the Agriculture appropriation bill.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. In just a minute. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] will move and work as earnestly for the elimination of some of those items in the Agricultural bill when that bill comes before the committee of the next Congress, I will assist him with all my might to try to have them greatly reduced.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. For a question.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman and I voted for those measures. We were together then. We part now when we vote for rehabilitation.

Mr. GOOD. Then, why do you complain of those things? If you have voted for them, you ought to be satisfied.

Mr. FESS. I voted for both. You are voting for hogs and not for men. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Iowa is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman from Ohio votes for the extermination of the cattle tick and for the eradication of the boll weevil and for the control of the hog cholera, but when it comes to bringing in a resolution for men who have lost a finger or two fingers, what does he say about the man or the woman or the child who contracts the deadly disease of tuberculosis in the factory? Does he propose to do a thing for that poor unfortunate?

Mr. FESS. Yes. The bill provides for that.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no. Does the gentleman bring out a bill providing for the poor child who has lost a father and who is left an orphan, with no one to protect him or defend him? Oh, no. The gentleman does nothing of the kind. No; so far as such unfortunate is concerned, he, too, first votes for hogs. He brings out a bill here, perchance, because it is the opinion of "forward-looking men," who hear voices in the sky calling to him to report out a bill simply to rehabilitate the man with a finger off. I believe that all the unfortunates in the United States should be cared for tenderly out of the treasuries of the respective States and not out of the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the debate be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. FESS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 77.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. Those in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] A sufficient number have risen. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 86.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 7, lines 14 to 17, strike out the words "for the purpose of making studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their placements in suitable or gainful occupations, and," and in lines 23 and 24 strike out the words "including attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations," and, on page 7, line 25, and on page 8, lines 1 and 2, respectively, strike out the words "and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference, law books, and periodicals."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct the second section of the amendment so as to include "attendance on meetings." Inadvertently I left that out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to amend the second section of his amendment by including "attendance at meetings." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has the floor, and the motion of the gentleman from Texas is not in order now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the Vocational Board, under its experience and administration of the Smith-Hughes Educational Act and also the act for the rehabilitation of the disabled soldiers——

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has just been reported.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This amendment is simply to eliminate from this bill some authorizations for the expenditure of money which, in my judgment, without conference with other members of the committee, is not authorized under the existing status of the Vocational Board, for the reason that——

Mr. FESS Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to.

Mr. FESS. I think I will agree with what the gentleman has to say. This is purely administrative, and, quite naturally, it would be included in the investigations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman does not oppose the amendment?

Mr. FESS. As far as I am concerned, I accept the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. VARE. May we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the language proposed to be stricken out, which is "for the purpose of making studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their placements in suitable or gainful occupations."

It seems to me this is the very gist of the work of the Federal Board for Vocational Rehabilitation, and is the very thing that the money should be expended for, because the rest of it is merely for the common administrative expenses of the board.

Mr. FESS. I want to say to my friend that the Federal board has a force employed, and if there is any need of this work it will be done through the Department of Labor and also through the Department of Commerce, which two departments work in close cooperation. For that reason I did not think it would cripple the bill to let it go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: Page 7, line 10, strike out all of section 5.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on page 2 of this bill there is authorized to be appropriated $500,000 for the first year; for the second year $750,000, and for the third year $1,000,000.

But we do not stop there. On the bottom of that page you will find provision for further appropriations. In addition to the appropriations I have mentioned you will find an additional appropriation for the first year of $66.000; an additional appropriation for the second year of $46.000; and an additional appropriation for the third year of $34,000; these appropriations being in order to make it possible that the minimum allotment of $5,000 can be made to each State. That is all right as far as it goes. But these additional appropriations of $50.000 for the remainder of this year and $75.000 each for the succeeding three years in section 5 are for administration alone. Now, it has been stated upon the floor by every member of this committee from the chairman down that the only function that this Federal board would have with respect to this fund, so far as the Federal board was concerned, was to apportion the money to the States. Yet in section 5 we are providing for the expenditure of $50,000 for the rest of this fiscal year for administrative purposes alone, and for each and every year for four years we are providing for an additional expenditure of $75,000 for administrative purposes alone. For administering the fund for rehabilitating our soldiers this Federal board already has its machinery, its offices, its officers, assistants, experts, clerks, stenographers, and does not need any more. Now, what are some of these purposes? Let me read to you. [Cries of "Vote! Vote!"] Oh, Mr. Chairman, that is not going to stop me, if I have any of my five minutes left. I have heard the howling of the coyotes on the plains of west Texas so often that mere noise does not bother me or disconcert me. Now, let us see what this does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the Federal Board for Vocational Education is hereby authorized and empowered to receive such gifts and donations from either public or private sources as may be offered unconditionally. All moneys received as gifts or donations shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and shall constitute a permanent fund, to be called the "Special fund for vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons," to be used under the direction of the said board to defray the expenses of providing and maintaining courses of vocational rehabilitation in special cases, including the payment of necessary expenses of persons undergoing training. A full report of all gifts and donations offered and accepted, together with the names of the donors and the respective amounts contributed by each, and all disbursements therefrom shall be submitted annually to Congress by said board.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I have a motion to recommit which I ask to have read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman want something read for information in his time?

Mr. SEARS. I move to strike out the last word, and ask to have this read in my time for the information of the House. It is a motion to recommit that I shall offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SEARS moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education with instructions to report the same back instanter with the following amendment:

On page 3, line 7, after the word "act" strike out all of lines 7 and 8 down to the semicolon and insert the following: "And the Federal board shall furnish to the State boards annually general plans and specifications or such information on vocational education as they may have."

And also, in line 8, strike out all down to and including the semicolon after "directors," in line 17.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, for myself I have confidence in whatever State board my State may select. If you study the bill carefully, you will find that there will only go to each disabled person about $3.75 per annum, and I would like all of it to go to them and not to high-salaried persons. I therefore sincerely trust my motion to recommit will be adopted, in order that the above results may be obtained. I call attention seriously to the fact that as the bill is drawn the State will have to report to the Federal board, and the large clerical force which will be necessary to make a careful study of all the States will have to go over these reports. If they decide that the report of the State of Pennsylvania is inadvisable, they will send it back to Pennsylvania, and then the board will go through it again and send it back to the Federal board in Washington.

In my amendment the money goes directly to the State and is spent for the benefit of those cripples and this board furnishes to them such information as they may have.

I can not understand how anyone can vote against this motion to recommit from an economical standpoint, unless he has lost confidence in those who sent him here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4438) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, under the rule I believe the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is ordered under the rule. The question is, Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the first committee amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum, and pending that I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and one Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. CANNON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. I believe the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CANNON. I am informed by two or three parties that a demand will be made for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Wyoming moves a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 102 ayes and 91 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for tellers.

The question of tellers was taken and 14 Members arose.

So the request for tellers was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation in the sum of $147 required by the Reclamation Service to cover items disallowed in the accounts of C. G. Duganne, former disbursing officer of that service (S. Doc. No. 136), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Postmaster General submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $1,500,000 required for additional employees in the Postal Service, fiscal year 1920 (S. Doc. No. 137), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Director of the Bureau of Mines, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF MINES,
Washington, October 16, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In accordance with the resolution (S. Res. 203) recently passed by the Senate, I herewith advise you of the activities of the Bureau of Mines in the cooperative work with other Government departments in Washington relating to the foreign commerce of the United States. The bureau was not named specifically in the resolution, but inasmuch as reference was made to other agencies in other departments of the Government, I believe it advisable to apprise you of what the bureau has done and is doing in this respect.

The bureau's chief and perhaps most satisfactory contact work with the other departments has come through its representation on the economic liaison committee, which, as you may know, meets every Wednesday morning at the State Department under the able chairmanship of Mr. Wesley Frost, chief of the economic intelligence section of the department.

The work of the committee has resulted in the preparation and distribution among the various departments of valuable and timely reports on pertinent subjects and questions relating to the foreign commerce of the United States and its economic relations with other governments. These reports have covered such subjects as coal, petroleum, potash, cotton, finance, credits, etc., and their preparation has served to acquaint the representatives of the various departments concerned with the information and opinions of the other departments in a more thorough and comprehensive manner than has heretofore been the case.

The committee, as I understand it, has no recognized official status, but was initiated solely on the responsibility of the Secretary of State. In consequence of the lack of official status and because of some difference of opinion among the heads of the various departments represented, no publication of the activities and reports of the committee has been permissible, which in certain cases has, I believe, prevented the dissemination of the reports where such publicity might do an appreciable amount of good.

Part of the time of one man and a clerk have been spent upon this work since its inauguration, with such additional assistance in the way of expert advice and committee consultation as it has been necessary to obtain from the various specialists of the bureau whose special subjects are under consideration. The cost of this work is therefore nominal.

In addition to the bureau's participation in the work of the economic liaison committee, it has obtained such information as was possible from various sources and expressed such opinions, chiefly in the nature of written reports on special subjects, as circumstances and the limited personnel available for the work allowed. This work naturally covers the whole field of minerals and metals, particularly with regard to their beneficiation, both in mining and metallurgy. The bureau has been particularly concerned recently with the international situation in petroleum and coal.

I believe it would be of distinct value to the bureau, other Government departments, and the country at large, if the entire time of an able representative of the bureau and such clerical assistance as he might require could be engaged in this contact work, so that the bureau might have not only the assistance of other departments and render such assistance to them as it could in foreign trade matters, but also in order that the work of the various bureau specialists in matters having to do with foreign commerce could be correlated and disseminated from one source.

If it is in order, in accordance with the resolution, I believe it advisable to consider giving official status to the economic liaison committee or some such cooperative body representing the various Government departments, and that the deliberations and reports of such a committee should be given to the public under proper safeguards.

Trusting that this will give you the information desired, I am, Mr. President,

Most sincerely, yours, VAN. H. MANNING, Director.

The honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have a telegram here from the Presbyterian Synod of California and Nevada approving the covenant of the league of nations. I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., October 16, 1919.

The SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Care of Senator Pittman, of Nevada, Washington, D. C.:

The Synod of California and Nevada, consisting of over 55,000 communicants, in regular annual session assembled in San Francisco, while not committing itself upon the justice of the Shantung award or other details of the peace treaty, does nevertheless enthusiastically indorse the treaty as a whole, including the provisions for the establishment of a league of nations, and commends this treaty as humane and Christian, and it urges upon the Representatives of California and Nevada, the Hon. JAMES PHELAN and the Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON, of California, and the honorable Mr. PITTMAN and the honorable Mr. HENDERSON, of Nevada, their support of the measure of adoption, and strongly oppose any reservations or amendments which might invalidate the treaty as a whole.

WM. S. YOUNG, Stated Clerk.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have received a similar telegram, which I was going to ask to have read, but I join with my colleague in the presentation of the telegram which has been read and which will be inserted in the RECORD. I present the telegram addressed to me and ask that it be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to announce that I have received a good many more telegrams than those that have been introduced. The telegrams I have received are opposed to the league of nations. I shall not offer them.

Mr. LODGE. I submit a telegram which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., October 16, 1919.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Chairman Foreign Relations Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As Americans and friends of Irish freedom, we protest against imputation of Senator JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS that friends of Irish freedom, either collectively or individually, have threatened assassination to any person, either in official or private life. Our organization countenances only legal, constitutional methods of presenting the case of Ireland to our fellow citizens. May we ask that you give this protest proper publicity.

THOMAS J. CLARKE BRANCH
FRIENDS OF IRISH FREEDOM,
HUGH O'CONNOR, President.
T. O'LEARY, Secretary.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of the faculty and students of St. Meinrad Seminary, at St. Meinrad, Ind., remonstrating against the ratification of the league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have here a copy of resolutions adopted by the Legislative League of New York City, N. Y., an organization maintained by some public-spirited women of that State. The resolutions have to do with the covenant of the league of nations and condemn it as presented, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following resolution was adopted by the Legislative League, New York City, October 2, 1919:

"Whereas the German peace treaty and the so-called league of nations covenant should have been entirely separate instruments, but were purposely made into a conglomerate in order that the peace-loving American people should accept the whole mass of entanglements and obligations for the sake of speedily making peace with Germany; and

"Whereas our Congress has the power to declare the war at an end and that a state of peace now exists between the United States and Germany; and

"Whereas the league of nations covenant is grossly discriminatory against the United States in that Great Britain has been given six votes in the assembly while the great United States of America has been given only one, even though our States are more nearly sovereign than are the British colonies; and

"Whereas the United States went into the war 'to make the world safe for democracy,' but as a matter of fact the league of nations makes the world safe for imperialism and autocracy, throttling the spread of democracy forever; and

"Whereas article 10 and other articles would compel the American people to send their boys to and expend their taxes in any part of the globe where democracy manifests itself as it did with us in 1776 in order to suppress freedom and independence, even with shot and shell; and

"Whereas the league of nations definitely creates a superstate depriving the United States of her sovereignty, impairing the prestige of our Monroe doctrine, interfering with immigration and other internal policies; and

"Whereas our beloved country has gained its power, its greatness, its wealth, and its prestige because of its untrammeled freedom of action, and because of its adherence to Washington's admonition to beware of foreign entanglements; and

"Whereas we believe that the United States and its people can serve humanity better by their free and independent action rather than by the dictates of a foreign council or assembly: Be it

"Resolved, That we, the Legislative League of New York City, some of the mothers of the country, affectionately wishing the welfare of our beloved land, earnestly urge that Congress shall declare to the world that the war with Germany is ended and that a state of peace now exists between the United States and Germany; be it further

"Resolved, That we beg the Senators of the United States now debating our entering the so-called league of nations, that they cast their votes for the good of the American people and defeat the ratification of the so-called league of nations."

Mr. SPENCER. I present a memorial from the National Race Congress of America relating to certain phases which are especially applicable to the colored race, and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A Memorial.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 10, 1919.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

We, the National Race Congress of America, in its fourth session, representing 12,000,000 negroes, and viewing with alarm the spread of lawlessness and the growing injustice to millions of those loyal Americans, most respectfully petition the Congress of the United States as follows, to wit:

1. That you pass the antilynching bill, now pending, with the amendment giving any Federal court jurisdiction of the crime of lynching, regardless of venue.

2. That there be identical accommodations upon all common carriers, both in interstate and intrastate travel.

3. That all Federal registrations and elections be placed and held under Federal supervision.

4. That the statute on the removal of causes be so amended that plaintiffs and complainants shall have the rights in instituting suits in a Federal court on the ground of local prejudice that defendants have in removing causes to a Federal court on the ground of local prejudice, notice to be given under the amendment as now provided by law.

5. That a law be enacted creating a board of conciliation, the personnel of which shall be named by the United States Congress, and whose duties shall be to investigate and report to Congress on all matters of racial unrest, racial discriminations, and racial antipathy.

6. That a law be enacted providing equal military and naval training for all American citizens.

7. That a law be enacted making the assemblage or formation of a posse in any county unlawful, unless said assemblage or posse be called by the sheriff of the county in which assembled, and said assemblage or posse without the call of the sheriff of said county shall be prima facie evidence of mob violence.

8. That all legislation affecting labor be so drawn and passed that it can not be used for discriminations on account of race, creed, or color, and that there be an economic wage scale that shall apply to white and colored alike.

PASADENA, CALIF., October 14, 1919.

Senator HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.:

Shakespeare Club of Pasadena, Calif., having a membership of 700 women, at its business meeting October 14, by vote approved the immediate ratification of the treaty of peace and the league of nations by the United States Senate.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 14, 1919.

Senator GILBERT HITCHCOCK,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: I have the honor of advising you that at a meeting of the Musician Club, of this city, last night, after an address by L. A. Handly on the league of nations, on motion by Charles Wakefield Cadman the club earnestly urged the early ratification of the treaty that will make the league of nations reality.

FRED A. BACON, Secretary.

JOHN MUIR INTERMEDIATE SCHOOL,
Pasadena, Calif., October 10, 1919.

Senator GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Pasadena Teachers' Association, which consists of 300 members:

"Resolved, That the Pasadena Teachers' Association, believing that no other way presents itself to peacefully solve international problems, and that the United States should share the responsibilities as well as the advantages of a world power, urges the Senators of the State of California to assist in the ratification of the peace treaty and the covenant of the league of nations without delay or amendment."

Very truly, yours,

GEORGE HETZEL, President.
JANE J. POULSEN, Secretary.

ST. LOUIS, MO., October 15, 1919.

Senator HITCHCOCK,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Please read the following into CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"We, the Democratic Women's Central Committee of the State of Missouri, in convention assembled, do urge the United States Senate to ratify the peace treaty with its accompanying league of nations covenant as soon as possible, leaving further reservations and amendments to the constituent membership of the league of nations as they try it out in actual experience."

Mrs. W. W. MARTIN,
Member Democratic State Central Committee Missouri.

Mr. NEW. I send to the desk a copy of resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of the Friends of Irish Freedom held in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., on the evening of October 11, and ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at meeting at Tomlinson Hall, Indianapolis, Ind., October 11, 1919.

Whereas the United States entered the World War under the most solemn declaration of our President, who said: "America is fighting for the liberation of peoples everywhere from the aggression of autocratic force; for the liberty, the self-government, and the undictated development of all peoples"; and

Whereas every nation which engaged in the conflict accepted this new gospel of world liberty as announced by our President; and

Whereas England has subjected the people of Ireland to her rule for seven and one-half centuries, and still continues to do so against the will of the Irish people, expressed in the republican form of government which they, by an overwhelming majority, established to rule themselves: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, American citizens, who have assembled here to encourage and support the Irish Republic and do honor to the President of Ireland, do earnestly indorse and support the demand of the Irish people for the free exercise of their right of national independence; that we sincerely and respectfully urge the President and Congress of the United States to give immediate and effective recognition to the Irish Republic as the first and most necessary step in securing a lasting peace for the world and in redeeming our pledge given when entering the late war.

Whereas the covenant of the league of nations in its present form, without the previous recognition of Ireland's independence, would in effect condemn the Irish people to continue bondage by pledging America's support to England against any nation which might seek to render assistant to Ireland in her struggle for freedom: Be it

Resolved, That we call upon the Senate of the United States to oppose and vote against the said covenant, and we approve of the attitude adopted by Senators WATSON and NEW, of Indiana, in their opposition to the said covenant; and

Whereas England is expending approximately at the rate of $60,000,000 per year on her army of occupation in Ireland alone, not to mention the still larger sums spent in maintaining armies of occupation amongst other subject peoples: Be it further

Resolved, That we call upon Congress to withhold further loans or financial accommodations to Great Britain until she withdraws her army of occupation from Ireland.

Copies of these resolutions to be sent to the President of the United States, to Vice President MARSHALL, and to Senators WATSON and NEW.

Mr. MYERS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Park County, Mont., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of game sanctuaries in national forests, which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and Protection of Game.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented memorials of sundry citizens of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the establishment of a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Connecticut Baptist Convention, and a petition of sundry citizens of New Haven, Conn., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from a soldier, who writes to me from Madill, Okla.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MADILL, OKLA., July 9, 1919.

DEAR SIR: I write you this letter, believing that you will not hesitate to publish a letter written by a soldier boy who saw active service on the battle front in the great World War with Company B, Three hundred and forty-fourth Machine Gun Battalion, Ninetieth Division, and who followed the old Stars and Stripes in the battles of the Meuse, Argonne, and St. Mihiel.

It appears from reading your daily paper that you have nothing to offer your readers but to abuse and make fun of people that happen to oppose the United States adopting the proposed league of nations. You fail to offer any intelligent reason why the British-Wilson league should be accepted by this country, but content yourself by offering insults and contempt to the free-thinking people of America that are standing out and favoring this great Nation of ours retaining its traditional policy promulgated and established by the immortal Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe and adhered to by Lincoln, McKinley, and Roosevelt of keeping out of any entangling alliances with foreign nations.

You also forget that President Woodrow Wilson as late as February, 1916, bitterly assailed that class of citizens that were advocating going into the war with Germany or becoming involved in any foreign entanglements or alliances, and made the statement that he did not know what their standard of citizenship was, but that he could not subscribe to that standard.

Every reasonable man knows that in past history following every great war we have a bountiful crop of pacifists that are always promulgating some doctrine to prevent future wars; in fact, President Wilson, in 1916, led lots of people to believe that it did not make any difference what happened, that he would keep this country out of war, and it is very evident at this time, through the metropolitan press of the country, which has no fixed convictions on any principle of government and whose conscience is only moved by the jingle of gold, that lots of people are being led to believe that the proposed British-Wilson league of nations will prevent future wars for all time to come, when in truth and in fact the adoption of this proposed league of nations means that the free Government of the United States no longer exists and that the seat of government at Washington will have been removed to Geneva, Switzerland, where a few autocratic men, selected without any voice or vote of the people, will assemble with the kings and emperors and czars of the world and dictate the destiny of the world; that our Nation, by this agreement, pledges the last dollar of America and the last drop of American blood to police and protect the empires, the kingdoms, and the monarchies of all Europe, Asia, and Africa; and that all this supposed sentiment that is being talked about for this league of nations comes from the international bankers, the profiteers, that got rich out of the recent World War; these loud-mouthed patriots that petitioned Congress to pass the draft law and then used all their influence to keep their own boys at home. I now fling the challenge in your face that the boys that went through the horrors of the war on the actual battle front are not making any howl or sending out any ex-Presidents or Presidents to make speeches in behalf this un-American propaganda called the league of nations. I have not heard of any of the fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters of the thousands of dead American soldiers that sleep on foreign battle fields writing any letters or making any speeches in favor of this infamous doctrine called the league of nations, which binds this great, free country of ours to act as general policeman and guardian for the world and destroys our Nation, its Constitution, and its sovereignty, but in my humble judgment this proposed scheme should properly be called the alliance of the money changers, profiteers, and the get-rich-quick, who have no respect for the blood of American soldiers, the weeping of widows, and the groans of orphans as long as money can be poured into their coffers through any channel.

Will thank you to publish this letter, and if you have any sane or intelligent reason why any good citizen should use their influence to have the Senate of the United States approve this proposed league of nations, I would be glad for you to present them without abusing people who happen to differ from you.

Yours, very truly,

LEONARD MCKENZIE.

CLAIMS OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2120) for the relief of certain officers in the United States Army, asked to be discharged from further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was agreed to.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 215), as follows:

Whereas by the treaty between Germany on the one side and the allied and associated powers on the other, signed at Versailles the 28th day of June, A. D. 1919, it is provided that the same will come into force between the powers ratifying the same upon the deposit of ratifications by Germany and three of the said allied and associated powers; and

Whereas the said treaty has now been ratified by Germany and by three of the said powers, to wit, France, Great Britain, and Italy, and will be in effect between the said powers and the other signatories to the said treaty that have ratified the same upon the formal issuance of the procès-verbal reciting the ratifications aforesaid; and

Whereas by virtue of the said treaty the league of nations will thereupon come into being and be authorized to entertain representations in accordance with article 11 of the covenant for the league of nations, as follows:

"It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb either international peace or the good understanding between nations, upon which peace depends"; and

Whereas the amicable relations between Great Britain and the United States are continually imperiled by controversies over the government of Ireland: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that whenever the United States becomes a member of said league of nations, by ratification of the said treaty or otherwise, the Government of the United States should present to the council or the assembly of the league the state of affairs in Ireland and the right of its people to self-government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, the resolution goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That course is satisfactory.

ANALYSIS OF LABOR PROVISIONS OF THE TREATY.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, there is no question more involved or more far-reaching in its effect upon the future of this country than Part XIII of the treaty, which deals with the labor question. Because it is apparently in the interest of labor this phase of the treaty has had little opposition from Members of the Senate or the public generally. It is of such great importance that it ought to be thoroughly examined into before the treaty is finally passed upon. In fact, it is a subject that warrants a study and discussion that once entered upon will take several weeks of the Senate's time.

I know that there is a widespread feeling throughout the country that the treaty should be disposed of at once, but Part XIII is fraught with so much danger to the economic good of our Nation, and there is such a great possibility of injury not only to labor but to the industry of the country as well that even if the ratification of the treaty is delayed for another month this subject ought to be thoroughly ventilated. I have had given to me an analysis of Part XIII, prepared by Mr. Eugene E. Smith, editor of Labor Opinion, published at Portland, Oreg. This is a monthly digest of contemporary labor and industrial thought as expressed in labor, financial, and trade press. I commend this analysis to the careful consideration of the Members of this body, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The analysis is as follows:

"PART XIII, LABOR, TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

"(By Eugene E. Smith.)

"The following is in no wise intended to be controversial or argumentative, but it is intended that it shall start a train of thought that will lead toward and arrive at a proper determination of the question, Can the Democracy of the Republic of the United States of America, functioning through its constituted Government and the administration thereof, as that administration may be changed from time to time by the vote of all the people, operate more efficiently for social progress for all our people unhampered by a political, official alliance with the socialistic movements of Europe, or will it be aided in such efforts and then for unity by such an alliance? To keep clear and apart in the mind of the reader matters of fact and matters of the writer's opinion and the conclusions reached based on a combination of both on specific points, such facts, opinions, and conclusions are so captioned in that which follows.

"Facts: Part 13, captioned "Labor," treaty of peace with Germany (U. S. Senate Doc. No. 49, to be had on application to your Senator or to the Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C.), establishes a permanent organization (art. 387) recognized by the peace commission as an 'organization of labor' (art. 386), to be international in character and make-up, a membership by a nation in the league of nations carrying with it the obligations of membership in the labor organization (art. 387). The permanent organization of labor is to consist of—

"First. A general conference of representatives of the nations members of the league; and "Second. An international labor office (art. 388).

"For the purpose of summarizing, we will take up the make-up of the general conference of representatives first. The conference will meet at least once in every year, and may be held oftener if it is determined an occasion may so require. It will be composed of four delegates from each of the nations, members of the league, two of whom will be Government delegates, i. e., appointed by the Government to represent the Government's, hence the public's, interests; one of whom will be appointed by the Government, who shall be nominated by the employers, and one of whom shall be appointed by the Government, who shall be nominated by the workpeople of the member nation. Provision is made for advisers to the delegates, and where women are affected women advisers may be selected. An adviser may only speak in the conference upon request by the delegate whom he or she accompanies and on authorization of the president of the conference, and may not vote; however, an adviser may be privileged to both speak and vote if acting in the capacity of deputy for his or her delegate. Members (nations) 'undertake to nominate nongovernment delegates and advisers chosen in agreement with the industrial organizations, if such organizations exist, which are most representative of the employers or workpeople, as the case may be, in their respective countries.' (Art. 389.)

"Here it will be interesting to note, in order to comprehend the probable size and make-up of the international labor organizations of the future, the nations to be represented therein. These follow: The original members of the league of nations, signatories of the treaty of peace, which are the United States of America, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, British Empire (including Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India), China, Cuba, Ecuador, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hedjaz, Honduras, Italy, Japan, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Serb-Croat-Slovene State, Siam, Czecho-Slovakia, Uruguay; and the States invited, to date, to accede to the covenant of the league of nations, which are the Argentine Republic, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, Netherlands, Norway, Paraguay, Persia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Venezuela; and likewise the nations that in the future, in all likelihood, will be invited to accede to the covenant of the league of nations, which are Mexico, Russia, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and, sometime, Turkey—a total of 27 signatory nations, 13 States invited to become such, and 6 that sooner or later will be invited—a grand total of 46—which means a conference composed of from 100 to 150 or more delegates. (Annex No. 1 to part 1 of the treaty of peace with Germany.)

"The seat of the league of nations has been fixed at Geneva, Switzerland. (Art. 7.) The meetings of the international labor conference, excepting for the first meeting, will be held at the seat of the league of nations, except another place may be decided upon by a preceding conference by a two-thirds majority vote by the delegates present. (Art. 391.)

"The international labor office, which is the second and administrative half of the international organization of labor set up by the league of nations, will be established 'at the seat of the league of nations as part of the organization of the league.' (Art. 392.) This office will be controlled by a governing body consisting of 24 persons appointed as follows: Twelve representing the Governments, 6 elected by the delegates to the conference representing employers and 6 elected by the delegates to the conference representing the workers. Eight of the 12 persons appointed to represent the Governments on the governing body of the international labor office will be nominated by members (nations) which are of chief industrial importance. If any question arises as to which of the members are of chief industrial importance the matter shall be decided by the council of the league of nations. This governing body will elect from its members its own chairman, will regulate its own procedure, and will fix its own times of meeting. (Art. 393.) It will appoint a director of the international labor office, who will be responsible for the official conduct of the office and for the performance of such other duties as may be assigned to him by the governing body. (Art. 394.)

"The director will appoint his own staff (art. 385) to carry out the functions of the international labor office, which include the 'collection and distribution of information on all subjects relating to the international adjustment of conditions in industrial life and labor' and the preparation of the agenda for the meetings of the conference and the editing and publication in French and in English and in other languages, if the governing body thinks desirable, of 'a periodical paper dealing with problems of industry and employment of international interest.' (Art. 396.) The international labor office will be entitled to the assistance of the secretary general of the league of nations in any matter in which it can be given. (Art. 398.)

"Article 7 of the treaty of peace specifies, among other things, that 'representatives and members of the league and officials of the league, when engaged on the business of the league, shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.'

"The foregoing will give one a fair idea of the scope and the importance of the proposed international labor conference, its close connection with the league of nations, its prestige because of that close connection, and the efficient machinery that is to be set up to carry out the proclamations and recommendations of the conference. The conference only has power to recommend to members of the league of nations the enactment of legislation or approval of treaties, and these recommendations must be approved by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present; however, 'each of the members undertakes that it will, within a period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the conference, or if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment, and in no case later than 18 months from the closing of the session of the conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competency the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action'—hence no member nation may ignore the recommendations of the conference when the same are presented under the terms of the treaty. (Art. 405.)

"Provision is also made in the treaty under articles 411 and 412 for a commission of inquiry to inquire into any neglect on the part of any member ratifying any of the convention or recommendations of the conference to enforce the provisions thereof, and if found necessary to obtain this enforcement the matter may be referred to the permanent court of international justice of the league of nations (art. 415), the decision of which shall be final. (Art. 417.)

"Opinion: Any decision, from the simple viewpoint of an American citizen as such only, on the merits or demerits or the probable future effects of the international labor organization as set up in the treaty of peace, must not be based merely upon the written words, clauses, and articles dealing therewith in part 13 of said treaty. Rather we must take into consideration, first, the conditions existing at the time these were written, particularly as these conditions bore upon the destiny of the European Governments; and, second, the present tendency on the part of these Governments and their respective national labor movements toward acceptance of the principle of nationalization of private capital and industry, or, in other words, toward socialism and to some degree at least toward Bolshevism, which interpreted means a dictatorship by the proletariat or the so-called wageworkers, because it is reasonable to assume that if the tendency is in this direction it will be reflected more and more year by year in the recommendations and proclamations of the international labor conference. In every country of industrial importance, likely to have influential representation in these conferences, the trade-union movements, with the exception of the United States, are strongly socialistic.

"In July of this year there met at Amsterdam delegates representing the trade-union movements of the various European nations and the United States with the purpose to reorganize the International Trade Union Congress, and this purpose was effected. On nomination by Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. W. A. Appleton, secretary of the Confederation of British Trade Unions, was elected president of the International Trade Union Congress, succeeding Carl Legien, of Germany, who was president of the congress at the time of the outbreak of the World War. According to an historical survey of the proceedings of the Amsterdam meeting published in the Democrat, of London, edited by Mr. Appleton, directly after the adjournment of the International Trade Union Congress convention the delegates reassembled into an international socialist convention, in which all countries were represented by the same delegates they were represented by in the International Trade Union Congress, with the exception of the United States and its delegates. According to the same article or survey, the Amsterdam International Trade Union Congress adopted a resolution, binding upon all members, which set the objective in the international labor conferences to be held under the auspices of the league of nations to be the program of the international trade union conference that was held early in 1919 at Berne, Switzerland. In this connection it is interesting to note that the American labor movement was not represented at the Berne conference. It is also just as interesting to note further that the international trade union conference at Berne of 1919 declared that an international parliament of labor should be set up by the league of nations with power and authority to issue not only international conventions with the binding force of law behind them but also international laws which, immediately upon adoption should have the same force legally as national laws in all nations.

"The so-called labor-capital problem, said to be the greatest problem now before the various peoples of the world, is, in the opinion of the writer, not the question at issue at all, for while there are some differences between what we call labor, meaning thereby the manual wageworkers of our country, and so-called capital, better described as the management in industry, few, if any, of these differences are irreconcilable, particularly in the United States. The real question at issue can be more properly described as being the irreconcilable difference between capitalism and socialism and the more extreme form of socialism commonly described as Bolshevism, which had its genesis in the teachings and doctrines of socialism. Hence from the viewpoint of this analysis the question to be considered is not a labor-capital question in the commonly accepted sense. Reduced to words it might be put thus: Will the international labor conference and its machinery, as a part of the league of nations, function so as to actually bring labor and industrial management in America into a closer understanding, assuring justice to each without destroying either, but rather securing that which is due to both, or will it function to advance tenets, doctrines, and the cause of socialism, syndicalism, or even extreme Bolshevism? We have shown where the International Trade Union Congress, lately adjourned in Amsterdam, declared for the Berne program, which was largely socialistic and inclined in some matters toward Bolshevism.

"It might be well to examine as well as we may the attitude of the principal European Governments toward a very vital contention made by the Berne conference, namely, the right of the workers in an international parliament to promulgate decrees having the force and legal binding effect of international law, binding on all countries members of the league of nations. On June 1 of this year Acting Secretary of State Long, at Washington, D. C., made public through the press the German note on international labor (and the note of the allied Governments in reply thereto), protesting against the arrangements made by the peace commission for an international organization of labor under the league of nations. The German peace delegation in this note said: 'In the opinion of the German democratic government the final decision in questions of labor law and labor protection belongs to the workers themselves.' In another place in the same note the delegation said: 'According to the resolutions of the international trade-union conference at Berne, the international parliament of labor is to issue not only international conventions with legal binding force but also international laws which, from the moment of their adoption, are to have the same effect (legally binding force) as national laws (proclamations to the workers of all countries adopted by the international trade-union conference at Berne, 1919, at the motion of Jousaux, the delegate from France). The draft of the German democratic government indorses this resolution and makes the passing of such laws depend on the assent of four-fifths of the nations represented.' In other words, the German democratic government was, and we assume is, in favor of an international labor parliament as a part of the league of nations with power to issue international edicts on labor questions binding on all nations members of the league when four-fifths of the countries represented in the international labor parliament vote in favor of any such edict.

"The reply of the allied and associated governments, dated May 31, and signed by President Clemenceau, of the peace commission, is fully as interesting, though seeming to reject in toto the contentions of the German Government. Section 1 of Premier Clemenceau's reply, which, of course, was approved by our own representative, President Wilson, said in part: 'The allied institutions hold it to be their duty to collaborate with labor in the formulation of such laws, but the laws must be passed upon by representatives of the whole community.' Further along in his note Premier Clemenceau says, however (in the latter part of section 5): 'The labor commission, moreover, set up by the peace conference envisaged all of the points mentioned in your letter as coming within the scope of the labor organization. * * *' Section 6 of the same note reads in part: 'It [the labor commission] also adopted a resolution (copy annexed) in favor of the organization being given power as soon as possible to pass resolutions possessing the force of international law. International labor laws can not at present be made operative merely by resolutions passed at conferences. The workers of one country are not prepared to be bound in all by laws imposed on them by representatives of other countries; international conventions as provided for under the peace treaty are, therefore, at present more effective than international labor laws, for the enforcement of which no penal sanctions can be applied.' In annex No. 2 of the allied note here referred to Premier Clemenceau transmits to the German delegation a copy of the resolution referred to by him in the first sentence of section 6 of his note. The resolution reads:

"The commission expresses the hope that as soon as it may be possible an agreement will be arrived at between the high contracting parties with a view to endowing the international labor conference under the auspices of the league of nations with power to make, under conditions to be determined, resolutions possessing the force of international law.

"The underscoring of the words 'at present' appearing twice in section 6 of the note quoted is ours as it strikes us as being peculiar that these words should be used and repeated, thus leaving the impression that probably in the future the principle adopted at the Berne conference and approved by the German democratic government might be brought into full acceptance through the league of nations and its international labor conferences by the members of the league, leaving one to assume that when the labor commission, headed by Mr. Gompers, whose colleague from America was Mr. E. N. Hurley, adopted the resolution expressing the hope that the high contracting parties would as soon as possible endow the international labor conference with power to pass resolutions possessing the force of international law, they, the commission, possibly had some ground for belief that Messrs. Clemenceau, Wilson, George, et al, felt kindly toward their aspirations and hopes on this point and might help to shape things toward the end that these might be consummated.

"So much for the probable tendency of the various European national labor movements and the European Governments to go contrary to the ideals of America. Examination of the social currents in European Nations, including even conservative England, will lead one to no other belief except that the trade-union movements of these countries are fast becoming anticapital and prosocialist. This is strongly reflected in their different Governments; hence it is more than probable that a majority of the delegates elected by and from the various countries to sit as such in the international conferences of labor will be anticapital and prosocialist. While it is true the agenda or program of each meeting of the conference is set in advance and any Government may object to any item of the agenda, it is also true that the governing body of the international labor office determines the agenda from year to year, and it is also true that regardless of any Government's objection to any item on the agenda the conference may by two-thirds vote set the objection aside and consider the item at another time at their own discretion, and even the protesting Government is bound under its treaty obligations to present any resolution or recommendation passed by the conference and so ordered to its national congress or parliament within practically one year from the adoption of the recommendation by the labor conference. As an example, England has declared for the nationalization of its coal mines. The international labor conference could arrange for a discussion of the subject at a coming meeting and upon approval of the principle by two-thirds of the delegates voting in a conference our Government and every other Government represented in the league would be forced under its treaty obligations to place the matter before Congress, and the full force of all the machinery of the international labor office with its world-wide publication, its scores of expert advisors and statisticians, could be placed behind the campaign for adoption. The same thing could easily happen in the matter of forcing our Government to put before its Congress the matter of waiving its right to participate in determining our country's will in the passage of international or even national labor laws and conferring all its rights in the matter upon the international labor conference. These matters are not only important to so-called capital but, we assume, are of vital import to American workpeople. Granting that American labor and European labor desire approximately the same degree of attainment in the matters of economic security, opportunity, etc., the method of approach is radically different in the European countries and our own.

"One provision of the treaty in particular can easily operate to the end that independent alliances may be formed between the various groups of labor and employers which may be in competition with America for foreign trade and markets. We refer to article 407, which says, 'If any convention coming before the conference for final consideration fails to secure the support of two-thirds of the delegates present it shall nevertheless be within the rights of any of the members of the permanent organization to agree to such convention among themselves,' thus affording ample opportunity for different balances of industrial power to be struck between nations contending for trade and economic advantages, for nations will always so contend as long as there are nations. It must never be forgotten that America is the richest of all nations, and there is a human trait, seemingly, that is ineradicable, and that is to be envious of and combine against wealth. While it is true the league of nations seeks through its machinery to prevent political side combinations of governments, it would appear that it is affording an official channel through which industrial and economic combinations may be made under the guise of social and labor betterment. This aside, it would appear from the foregoing that a wonderful opportunity will be presented, not yet recognized, it would seem, by either the Socialists or those who believe in the capitalistic system of production, for the spreading and dissemination over the entire surface of the earth of the doctrines of socialism, paid for—and stamped with their implied approval, at least—by the capitalistic nations of the world. It would appear that America must in the nature of things be forced to go Europe's way rather than by example to succeed in the American way to find relief from the present chaotic condition, an example set up by a leadership based upon the firm rock of Americanism and the ideals of America for the individual citizen whose happiness and welfare, according to our fathers, are more important than the strength and welfare of any Government, when this is built upon the unhappiness of its subjects or citizens.

"It is true that the labor commission set up by the peace commission did, with a world of detail, seek to surround the international labor conference with safeguards and checks that would prevent that which we have described; but it is equally true, and this is based on the experience and history of the past, that any body of men formed into a conference or assembly or parliament or bureau and who are given certain legislative, administrative, or judicial powers seek untiringly and unceasingly to develop and enlarge those powers and fight bitterly any attempt that is made to take any power from them. The only excuse or reason America has for entering into any such combination is to rescue Europe from a possible condition of utter chaos. To do this through the machinery of the international labor conference will mean that, despite an overwhelming voting strength against them, the representatives of our Government and the representatives of our employers and of our labor, totaling four in number, must at all times lead and direct the other delegates the American way or else be led and directed by the European delegates the European way; hence it is not strange if some Americans think that we can do more for Europe by acting independently in such matters and by our success demonstrating the worth and soundness of our remedies.

"In a sense the international labor conference is a legislative body, with representatives elected thereto by certain industrial groups, and even the Government delegates elected thereto will more than likely be men or women closely allied with industry or keenly sympathetic with one group or the other. Not to make an odious or extreme comparison, it resembles in some ways the industrial or class legislative bodies that some of our extremists would set up to replace the present political scheme of government. Just how many years must go by with the annual or more frequent meetings of the international labor conference before it becomes actually a serious competitor for supremacy with that of our political Government is a question for the future to determine, but a question that is rich in possibilities and deserves present examination.

"Conclusions: These may be summarized as follows:

"First. That because of the tendency on the part of the foreign national labor movements and the peoples of European nations toward socialism, the international labor conference will become the world clearing house for socialist propaganda, tinctured more or less with plain Bolshevism.

"Second. Opportunity will be made more easy for effective economic and trade alliances—disguised as labor treaties—against the interests of the foreign trade of the United States.

"Third. An undue burden and responsibility will be placed, through our participation in the international labor conference, upon American labor and American capital for the redeeming to a sound footing the social, political, and economic conditions of European nations.

"Fourth. That the international labor conference will from year to year gain for itself greater and greater power, to the final end that this power will overshadow the political power of our Government over certain vital domestic policies, thus threatening political and democratic government itself.

"Fifth. It will be far better that a labor bureau or department be set up by the league of nations corresponding with our Federal Department of Labor, leaving the different national labor movements to meet when and how they choose as such, as they now do in the International Trade Union Congress, giving them the free exercise of the right to submit singly or jointly, either by themselves or in conjunction with the employing interests of any one or more nations, that which is their program for national and international law affecting labor.

"Sixth. It is unreasonable to assume that the employing interests of America will be keen to enter into agreements with the American labor movement, thus strengthening it, if that movement is continually assailed through the machinery of the international labor conference with un-American doctrines.

"Seventh. No national understanding between American labor and management of American industry can be brought about if every year the entire subject is to be opened up by non-American influences. In time this truth will be borne home to the American workers."

AFFAIRS IN TURKEY AND ARMENIA.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read an article appearing in the Washington Post of Thursday, October 16—yesterday morning—entitled "Turkish pact waits." After the reading I desire to make a few brief comments upon the article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"TURKISH PACT WAITS—POWERS WANT WILSON TO ACT ON ARMENIA AND DARDANELLES—SYRIA A BONE OF CONTENTION—ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND ITALY DISAGREE OVER DISPOSITION OF TERRITORY—PARTITION OF EMPIRE COMPLICATED BY SECRET TREATIES IN WHICH ALLIES PLAY FALSE TO ONE ANOTHER—SMYRNIA, PROMISED TO ITALY, GIVEN TO GREECE—UNITED STATES THE CRUX IN THE CARVING WILSON POSTPONED.

"(By Ryley Grannon.)

"Among other matters awaiting President Wilson's attention is the partition of the Turkish Empire. The great powers are unable to move until they receive word from Washington. The treaty with Turkey can not be signed until Mr. Wilson gives the word. The partition of the Turkish Empire is the subject of one of the interesting secret chapters of the war. Secret diplomacy never had greater play than in the expected carving up of Turkey.

"STILL DECEIVING ONE ANOTHER.

"The European Governments fairly excelled themselves in the game of 'double crossing,' and some of them are still at it. The United States is now involved, and until it indicates what part of Turkey it will annex the other powers will continue their rivalries.

"The first treaty of the powers providing for the partition of Turkey was made by Great Britain, France, and Russia. The pourparlers began in March, 1915, but the treaty was not concluded until May, 1916.

"The now famous treaty of London had been made in April, 1915. It was signed by Sir Edward Grey, Jules Cambon, Marquis Imperiali, and Count Benckendorff. Article 9 of that treaty provides that 'France, Great Britain, and Russia recognize as an axiom the fact that Italy is interested in maintaining the political balance of power in the Mediterranean, and her right to take over, when Turkey is broken up, a portion equal to theirs in the Mediterranean.'

"ITALY IGNORED IN 1916 TREATY.

"The other powers appear to have forgotten this treaty, for they concluded the treaty of May, 1916, without regard to Italy. The 1916 treaty carved up Turkey roughly as follows:

"To Great Britain: Direct administration of southern Mesopotamia, including Bagdad, Akri, and Kaiffa, and as a British zone of influence all the remainder of Mesopotamia.

"To France: Direct administration of all Syria, and as a zone of influence Adana, Sivas, Diarberkir, and tributary territory.

"To Russia: Constantinople and the Straits, with a part of southern Thrace, a stretch of the Asiatic coast adjacent to the straits, and the islands of the Sea of Marmora, Imbros, and Tenedos.

"ARRANGE FOR PALESTINE.

"Palestine was to be placed under an international régime. Special clauses disposed of Arabia, with advantages to Great Britain in securing communication between Egypt and Mesopotamia.

"In the fall of 1916 Italy became aware of this treaty. There was a meeting of the premiers at the little French town of St. Jean de Maurienne. It was a stormy session. The upshot was another treaty which admitted Italy to a share of the Turkish spoils.

"This Anglo-French-Italian treaty was made in 1917, after the United States had broken with Germany. All knowledge of it was kept from the United States. President Wilson said he knew nothing of it until he arrived in Paris.

"SMYRNA GIVEN TO ITALY.

"The treaty recognized the changes caused by Russia's collapse. Constantinople and the Straits were to be placed under an international régime. Italy was to have Smyrna under 'direct administration,' and for a zone of influence was to take over a territory north of Smyrna as far as the Gulf of Adramyti. The other powers retained their respective slices of Turkey.

"Then came the peace conference and President Wilson, abolition of secret treaties, self-determination, and all. There was a controversy over Fiume, and the Italian delegation temporarily withdrew. While they were absent the 'big three' sent for Premier Venizelos, of Greece, and told him to occupy Smyrna. Greece instantly moved, and her troops still occupy Smyrna.

"SECRET TREATY NULLIFIED.

"The three powers in control at that time in Paris—France, Great Britain, and the United States—nullified the secret treaty so far as it related to Smyrna. When the Italians returned to the peace conference they found it necessary to accept the fait accompli.

"But the powers are unable to agree among themselves concerning Turkey. France and Great Britain are at odds over Syria, which Great Britain now thinks should be left to the disposal of the league of nations. The British delegates have led off in accepting the mandatory plan, and seem to be willing to do away with all treaty rights if the league of nations will promise in advance to give England the same territories under a mandate. France is skeptical and holds to the treaties. Italy leans to the French view.

"The question was not settled when President Wilson left Paris. He wished to have the United States take a mandate over Armenia and possibly over Constantinople, but he could not promise that the people and Congress would support him. Therefore he told his colleagues in the peace conference to postpone the partition of Turkey until he could consult American public opinion.

"The Allies have endeavored to agree among themselves and hasten the carving-up process, but no one of them is willing to assume the burden of governing Armenia, which is full of fighting tribes and lacking in natural resources. Without the Armenian and Dardanelles questions settled, the powers can not act. They must wait upon President Wilson.

"Hence Thanksgiving is almost here and the hungry powers have no Turkey."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For what purpose does the Senator desire me to yield?

Mr. POMERENE. Simply to ask a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The article which was just read, I believe, was presented by the Senator?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It was presented by me.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator advise us who wrote the article?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not know who the employees of the Washington Post are. The article was clipped from the Washington Post of yesterday.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand it purports to have been written by Ryley Grannon, and I wondered if the Senator knows who he is?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not; but the Senator can find out if he wants to.

Mr. POMERENE. I am trying to find out.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have received a good many letters from people, mostly clergymen, who are very much interested in the Armenian question and who ask that something be done to protect the Armenian people from slaughter by the Turks. They state that the extermination of the Armenian race is threatened. Of course we know, or we have been informed through the press, that the British are rapidly withdrawing their forces from Armenia and the Caucasus and have requested this country to send from 100,000 to 200,000 men over there to take the place of the withdrawn British troops.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. There are not any undeveloped oil fields in Armenia or Turkey, then?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The article states that the President is very anxious that we should accept the mandate for Armenia, and, therefore, I assume there is no oil or anything else of use to this country there; but, Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. KING. Of course, the distinguished Senator from Idaho knows very much more about this subject than I do, and about the geography, the physical characteristics, and the resources of Armenia; but, if he will pardon me, there is oil in the northern part of Armenia and in the provinces contiguous to it which, perhaps, will come under the mandate of some Government.

Mr. BORAH. I have not any doubt, then, Mr. President, if oil is there that the situation will be taken care of by the English troops.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether there is oil there or not, there is trouble there.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And if anybody can furnish the oil to pour on the troubled waters, now is the time to bring the oil can around before we get in any deeper. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, on the calendar day of September 9, 1919, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] in behalf of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] presented Senate joint resolution 106, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The committee took it up for consideration a few days ago, but came to an impasse because certain information was desired as to what sort of a situation the President had created in relation to Armenia and Constantinople. A proposition was made in the committee to request that such information be given to the committee, so that it could act intelligently upon the joint resolution; but owing to representations made to the committee as to the inability of the President to transact business of that kind at this time the request for information was not pressed and the whole matter remains in abeyance. Meantime people continued to be agitated about what we are going to do to protect the Armenians, and all that I am able to answer them is that we have never declared war on Turkey, and the only way that I know to protect the Armenians is to send an army over there to fight off the Turks. Whether the people who desire to protect the Armenians want to compose that army themselves or want to send their wives' relatives on this pleasing mission I do not know; but here is the joint resolution introduced at the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi:

"Whereas the withdrawal of the British troops from the Caucasus and Armenia will leave the Armenian people helpless against the attacks of the Kurds and the Turks; and

"Whereas the American people are deeply and sincerely sympathetic with the aspirations of the Armenian people for liberty and peace and progress: Therefore be it

"Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to use such military and naval forces of the United States as in his opinion may seem expedient for the maintenance of peace and tranquillity in Armenia until the settlement of the affairs of that country has been completed by treaty between the nations.

"SEC. 2. There is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $——— to enable the President to execute the foregoing resolution."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suppose the Senator from Connecticut noticed the statement of the President in one of the speeches that he made on his recent tour that if the league of nations were adopted no khaki-clad American—meaning American soldiers, I suppose—would ever again cross the Atlantic Ocean. That has been published quite extensively. I understand further that the suggestion in the article introduced by the Senator from Connecticut indicates that the troops that are spoken of in the joint resolution would be used in the performance of responsibilities assumed under the league of nations. In view of the fact that they are not going to cross the Atlantic, I suppose they will be sent by the way of the Pacific.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, I do not know, Mr. President; but that is one of the unsatisfactory conditions that exists. We do not know about many of these things, and we are not allowed to know, and, of course, under those circumstances we can not legislate intelligently.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] was discussing with me yesterday the question of the dispatch of 5,000 American troops that we understand have already sailed, night before last, to be used in Silesia. Nobody knows under what authority those troops are sent there. Of course, we know that they are ordered there by the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff, or whoever is the proper military official to order them; but whether there is lawful authority, now that the war is over, for sending American troops to Armenia and to Silesia and to Siberia, nobody knows.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I will say to the Senator that I had expected to refer to this matter of troops being sent to Silesia during the debate that I presume will take place to-day upon other amendments to this proposed treaty, as I think we can obtain some information from Senators upon the floor, at any rate, as to the act itself, and as to the assumed authority for this act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I only referred to that matter incidentally, Mr. President, because it was of a similar character to the authorization contained in the joint resolution to which I referred, to wit, Senate joint resolution 106. If the President of the United States thinks it is necessary for Congress to authorize him to send troops to Armenia, I do not understand why a similar joint resolution would not be necessary to authorize the dispatch of our soldiers to Silesia. Of course, I understand that under the terms of the treaty—which, of course, is not yet in existence so far as this country is concerned—and, I assume, under the terms of the armistice, certain American troops can be lawfully employed in occupying, policing, and guarding certain territories there, and I understand there are forces on the Rhine, and possibly in the Saar Basin, or in other parts there, which may be legitimately there; but these other military movements that are now going on, now that the war is over, I think the Senate is entitled to information about. Certainly the Senate is entitled to it, I think, before it should be requested to pass joint resolutions authorizing the dispatch of such troops.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wanted to interrupt the Senator at that point to say that I have just been informed, and very reliably, that it is now contemplated to send a brigade to Lithuania, which I thought might interest the Senator in connection with what he is saying about these other military excursions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator seems to make no distinction, if I interpreted his remarks correctly, between American troops being sent to Armenia and American troops being used upon the Continent of Europe and in fields where German troops are operating.

I agree with the Senator, if I understand the situation correctly, that not having declared war against Turkey, before we send troops to Turkey or to Armenia, no matter how laudable the object may be, there ought to be further information vouchsafed to the Senate. I certainly would not feel like voting for that joint resolution, much as I sympathize with the Armenians, until I understood a little more about conditions.

The Senator states that perhaps American troops are in the Saar Basin and upon the Rhine and perhaps in other parts of Europe where it is necessary to enforce the terms of the treaty against Germany. I submit to the Senator in all good faith would not the obligation rest upon the allied Governments, having set up Poland, to see that Germany, by military operations, did not infringe the orders of the allied powers, including the United States, with respect to Poland, and that Germany carried out the terms of the treaty? And if that question is answered affirmatively—and it seems to me it must be answered affirmatively—would it not then be a duty resting upon the allied and associated powers to use sufficient military force against Germany to see that the mandates of the allied and associated powers, as set forth in the treaty, are carried into effect?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator, when he starts, thinks he is going to ask a very simple and single question, but his mind is so resourceful and his brain so active that my experience is that by the time he has sat down my mental capacity is insufficient to restate all that he has stated and give him the answers, seriatim, to his questions. The gist of it, however, as I gather it, is this: Were we not bound, under the treaty, to furnish troops in certain places? To that I say no, because we have not yet ratified the treaty. Any obligations that we are under now, as I understand, to furnish troops over there are such as were created by the armistice, or such as the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy has under the war powers, by virtue of our recognition of the existence of a state of war between ourselves and the Central Powers.

However that may be, this dispatch of troops is in progress. Neither we, who have to provide for their payment and the maintenance of the Army, nor the public know anything about what else is contemplated. We are ignorant of why these military movements are going on.

Now, I am not rash enough to say that it is illegal, because I do not know. It is wise not to express an opinion upon an important matter of that kind—the use of our military forces in troublous times like these—unless one speaks by the card. When you are only able to get at the facts from hour to hour, as dispatches appear in the public press in regard to the sending of troops hither and thither to foreign lands upon unknown missions, of course, without knowing the object for which they are dispatched, you can not well express a trustworthy opinion as to whether they are authorized or not.

Of course, we all know that this Government always has, whenever there was danger to American citizens or American property in any foreign land, felt that our citizens were entitled to the protection of our flag; and we have always landed troops—marines or other kinds of troops or sailors—to protect any American citizens in jeopardy or their property. That is a lawful exercise of our military power. It may be that the 5,000 men who were dispatched to Silesia are sent there to protect American citizens. It may be that the administration or the War Department have some theory that technically the status of war which we declared to exist between ourselves and the Central Powers a year or two ago still exists, although actually it does not, and therefore that they have all the war powers that they ever had. Now, if the dispatch of these troops to Silesia, or the contemplated dispatch, the requested authorization for the dispatch of troops to Armenia, is a legitimate exercise of the conduct of the war against the Central Powers, I have nothing to say about its being authorized; but the Congress and the country, who are quite as much concerned in this matter as the administration, are kept in ignorance about it.

It may be wise that we should be kept in ignorance. I do not know. I know that is our state of mind; and the condition is such at present that even on bills and joint resolutions introduced at the request of the administration itself, when we ask why the authority is needed and what the troops are to do, we can not press the matter and get the information.

I have nothing further to suggest about this Armenian matter. I do think, however, that a resolution should be adopted by this body, and I hope it will be, calling for information about why troops are being sent to Silesia and why they are sent to other places. I think we are fairly entitled to it, in view of intimations and assertions such as are contained in the article from the Washington Post, which has just been read by the Secretary, in relation to some sort of an understanding between our peace commissioners at the peace conference and the peace commissioners of our associated powers, in view of the fact that there seems to have been some sort of an understanding about what we should do in Armenia and Anatolia and Constantinople, or what it was recommended that we should do, and in view of the statement in this article that it is delaying the confirmation of the proposed Bulgarian and Turkish treaties. These matters are all so interrelated that we can not act intelligently upon one without knowing the contents of the entire proposition.

They are all interwoven, Mr. President. This whole situation in Asia Minor is interwoven with the very treaty we are considering. We are told that the treaty with Turkey, to which we have to be a party, will be presented to us after this treaty shall have been ratified, possibly, though I hope that this treaty will not be ratified. We have done whatever was required by this treaty without knowing whether it coincides with the other treaty or with what we would like to do about the other treaty, or whether the treaties with Bulgaria, Turkey, and Germany, when they are all ratified, will produce a situation we approve of, or whether we are being led step by step in the dark, without proper information, to ratify one treaty which may create a status from which we can not recede, although we would like to, and by reason of which we will be compelled to take the next step, which we would not have taken if we could have foreseen it.

We are a coordinate branch of the treaty-making power, Mr. President. There is a situation in Europe, Asia, and Africa which presents a composite scheme, and there is a plan in somebody's mind, or in the mind of some sets of people, that after these different parts are fitted together you will see a picture that is supposed to be harmonious and understandable; and we are handed the head or the tail or the trunk of the animal and are told, "Ratify that, and afterwards we will hand you the trimmings." I would like to see the picture of the whole animal before I say whether I like it or not; and I think, as a coordinate branch of the treaty-making power, we are entitled to know what the situation is that it is desired to produce. No one can act intelligently upon this thing unless he does know it.

Our partner in this treaty-making business knows the whole proposition. We are considering this treaty in open executive session, Mr. President, because it is no ordinary treaty. It is a document wrought under the tense and abnormal psychology which pervades all the nations of the world as a natural consequence of the tremendous crisis through which we have passed, and we are considering it in open executive session because we think all the people of this country—and of other countries, too, for that matter—should know why we approve or disapprove of the particular features of the treaty. But we do not get the necessary information from our partner, who knows the whole of it. For myself, I do not think it is fair to this branch of the treaty-making power, and I do not think that it is fair to the country, Mr. President.

I hope somebody will introduce a resolution to find out what the proposition is in Armenia; how far we have been committed, if at all, by the President, who has the authority to initiate agreements, at least; and I hope that some information concerning the dispatch of our armies to these various parts of the world will be called for by resolution of the Senate.

AMERICAN TROOPS FOR SILESIA.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, like the Senator from Connecticut, I have been disturbed at the news which reached us yesterday or the day before concerning the dispatch of troops abroad, and, like the Senator from Connecticut, I have been exceedingly anxious to know upon what authority they have been sent and for what purpose.

Again, like the Senator from Connecticut, I am somewhat uncertain as to the authority, and I do not venture at this time to express an opinion. But, concerned as I was, I called at the War Department yesterday morning to ascertain what I could regarding the expedition which has started for Silesia. I conversed with the Assistant Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff in the absence of the Secretary of War himself. I learned that the expedition, as the Senator from Connecticut stated, consists in the aggregate of about 5,000 men—the Fifth and the Fiftieth Regiments of Infantry and suitable detachments of Medical Corps and quartermaster troops. It is bound, in the first instance, for Coblenz, to be held there pending the time when direction shall be given it by some higher authority to proceed to Silesia, and there participate in the policing of the plebiscite. This American force, I was given to understand, is to form part of a force contributed by at least two other nations, the aggregate allied force of this kind to consist of something like 18,000 men. The time at which the force is expected to arrive in Silesia is entirely uncertain. The duration of its service there is entirely uncertain.

I was given to understand that the dispatch of this force is due to some arrangement made by the American peace commission in Paris, or some agreement made by them with the representatives of other powers, to the effect that America would join with the other powers in policing this far-away country while the plebiscite is being held.

It was intimated also that the power or authority for sending this force springs from the fact that we are still technically at war with Germany. I do not attempt to express an opinion upon that interpretation of the power of the Executive. I am not aware that there is anything in the terms of the armistice affecting Silesia at all.

I am in full sympathy with the policy of the department and the action of the administration in maintaining troops on the Rhine, in the so-called German occupied territory, in conformance with the terms of the armistice itself entered into on November 11. I notice that in the treaty pending before us there is a provision relating to Silesia, according to which, if it is ratified by this country, we may be called upon, in effect, to assist in policing Silesia. One of the several amendments offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], had it been adopted, would have resulted in withdrawing the United States from that obligation.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question? Is the Senator opposed to the establishment of the Government of Poland?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. NELSON. As proposed in the treaty?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. NELSON. Is not Silesia to be a part of it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know.

Mr. NELSON. Is not Silesia part of the country that is to compose Poland, and is it not to be determined by a plebiscite?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not tell whether it is to go to Poland until the plebiscite is taken.

Mr. NELSON. No one will know until then; and they simply want our troops there to see that there is fair plebiscite, that is all, to police it. Unless the Senator is opposed to the establishment of the Government of Poland, as provided for in the treaty, he ought not to object to this action by our Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota, I think, is quite unwarranted in drawing that conclusion. I, of course, am in favor of the establishment of an independent Polish State. But, like the Senator from Connecticut, I would like to know, as a Member of the Senate, and I may say as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, charged at this time with most important legislation looking to the permanent reorganization of the Regular Army, what commitments our administration has made for the use of American troops the world over. How can we legislate on the matter of the size of the Regular Army until we know how the Army is to be used and where?

If the intimation made by the Senator from Illinois a few moments ago is true, or reasonably accurate, that some other expedition is to be sent to Lithuania, it has a most distinct bearing upon our military policy. It is not a very effective way for a Government to handle its foreign affairs when the result is that the Congress is kept in the dark to such an extent that it can not legislate intelligently and in a constructive manner.

My purpose in going to the War Department to request the information about this expedition was first to ascertain its size, the approximate cost, if I could find that out, how long it would be absent upon this duty, what its purpose was, and incidentally what authority there was for sending it.

Mr. NELSON. Is the Senator opposed to the purpose to have a plebiscite there in connection with the establishment of the State of Poland?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not competent to answer that question. I do not know anything about Silesia and Poland in the present situation, and I am not permitted to know.

Mr. NELSON. Is not the treaty before the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The treaty does not tell me what are the internal conditions of Silesia.

Mr. NELSON. The treaty tells the Senator that there is to be a plebiscite there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very true; but I have not been informed, and I think no other Senator has been informed, whether or not it will take the participation of 5,000 American troops to see that the count is an honest one. All I want is information, and I think the Senate is entitled to information. I am not in favor of acting for or against any projected policy until we have information. That is all I have been asking.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota, in view of the much more intimate interest that the great allied European nations, victorious in this war, have in the readjustment of the internal affairs of Europe, and in view of the enormous assistance that this country has already rendered them in this war, does he not think that it would be equitable and fair, knowing that they have the power to do so, to provide that they should supervise the plebiscite in Silesia, and that the United States should be relieved of that duty?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if I am not taken from the floor, I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota to reply to the question addressed to him by the Senator from Washington. Perhaps the Senator from Minnesota will be content to answer it later. I shall take but a moment further.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think it needs an answer. The Senator can go on.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understood that the Senator from Minnesota had risen to ask permission to interrupt me.

Mr. NELSON. On reflection I concluded that it did not need any answer.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator says he wants information, and that he went to the War Department to get information. Did they refuse him information?

Mr. WADSWORTH. So far as the information went, I got it; but it did not tell me about Silesian prospects.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did they decline to give the Senator any information he asked for?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They did not decline to give me anything they knew about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a point of order. What is the pending motion? I have been waiting for an hour to present a paper. May I have the opportunity now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona raises the question of order.

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, no; I merely ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address by the Secretary of Labor at the opening of the Industrial Conference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from Arizona can not present the paper so long as the Senator from New York has the floor, unless he desires to take the Senator from New York from the floor by a point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not desire to take the Senator from New York from the floor, but I have been waiting for an hour to present the paper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator from New York has concluded to permit the Senator from Arizona to intrude upon the proceedings, but some of us would be a little better satisfied if we knew what the document is that he wants to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that at the present moment the document can not be received.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the ruling is a wise one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state what information he sought at the War Department?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I sought information as to the strength of the expedition and its composition, its destination, and its purpose, the authority under which it was sent, and the probable duration of its service abroad; and I have related to the Senate all that I found out at the War Department. But the thing that to me is unsatisfactory is the fact that we at this late date learn that by some agreement made by the American peace commission since the armistice was signed we are committed to the sending of troops to Silesia. We have never had any information to that effect, as I understand it, here in the Congress. It has some bearing upon the appropriations which we shall make for the support of the Army. It has some bearing upon the size of the Army and the military policy, and I am wondering——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I just finish my statement, and then I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania? I am wondering whether there are any other commitments, and I think we have a right to know. That is all. As to that I did not get any information.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether he suspects the agreement was made by Mr. Hoover or Col. House?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. PENROSE. I was told that possibly that distinguished military genius, Mr. Hoover, might have made it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator from New York takes his seat, let me ask him if he has any doubt as to the power of the President to order troops to Coblenz, where troops are already stationed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; Mr. President, I have not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator have any doubt as to the power of the President, in concurrence with the other nations associated with us in this war, to send troops into Germany under certain conditions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under certain conditions, as laid down in the armistice, but, as I understand it, there is no reference to Silesia or the policing of Silesia in the terms of the armistice. The only reference to Silesia and the policing of Silesia is contained in one of the articles of the treaty which this country has not yet ratified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This country has not yet ratified the treaty, but the Senate has already declined to amend the provision providing for American troops in Silesia.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask, does the Senator from Nebraska contend that that confers authority?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; but "the Senator from Nebraska" takes the position that the President has the power at this time to order troops to reenforce the other troops already in Coblenz, and by the time those troops get there it will be decided whether or not they will go farther.

The Senator from New York well knows that the purpose of this country is to stand by its object to give Poland an existence as a nation. The Senator from New York must realize that a part of that purpose contemplates a plebiscite in upper Silesia. The Senator must know also that to hold that plebiscite with German soldiers present would be a farce, and that the only way of having the plebiscite is to have troops there representing the associated and allied countries for that purpose. Unless the Senator is opposed to that purpose, he ought not to criticize it. The Senator must know also that Germany has already agreed to pay the expenses of those troops, and therefore they are not sent there at the expense of the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska beclouds the issue, so far as I am concerned, by this constant reference to the desire of the United States, admitted, for the establishment of an independent Polish State. I do want to see an independent Polish State established; but in its establishment I think the Senate of the United States is entitled to information as to what obligations our administration has entered into. The Senate had no information about this expedition until it read it in the newspapers yesterday. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate had no information about it until it read it in the newspapers yesterday. That is not the way to treat the Senate. We ought to have the information. We ought to be told here and now what our commitments are in a military sense. Is this the first one and is it the last one? If it is not the last one, what other commitments have we entered into? That is all I have been contending for. I do not pretend to pass upon the authority. I can not command a knowledge of the Constitution and of the law which would equip me to pass upon the authority.

This action is somewhat unusual at this time, prior to the ratification of the treaty and subsequent to entering into the terms of the armistice, which terms contain nothing about Silesia.

If it is a military necessity, if it is a necessity from the standpoint of humanitarianism that American troops shall join with British and French troops in policing that territory to stop bloodshed, possibly it is justified, but I want to know the character of the commitment which our representatives entered into at Paris, and whether or not there are any other commitments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. HITCHCOCK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut, who rose first.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator be kind enough to state what Gen. March, if he was the official whom the Senator saw, claimed was his authority?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The intimation that was given to me by both the officials was that we are still technically at war with Germany.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was that all?

Mr. WADSWORTH. And that under the war power the President could send troops of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was that all?

Mr. WADSWORTH. An intimation was made that the Senate had taken unfavorable action upon an amendment which would have withdrawn the United States from the policing of Silesia.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What inference was drawn from the action of the Senate on an amendment of a different nature?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was not a matter relating to the purpose of this expedition. I suppose the inference was that the department or the administration was justified in sending troops, in view of the vote of the Senate upon that amendment. I can not agree to that inference.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I simply rise to say that this puts me in mind of an incident we had a few days ago about the landing of a few troops on the Dalmatian coast. Great complaint was made then that we were making war on Italy. A resolution was introduced, and when we got the smoke cleared off all it amounted to was that the Italians had requested a few of our marines to go ashore there to keep order. It seemed to me then, as it turned out afterwards, to be a tempest in a teapot, and this is of a kindred nature.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I indorse most emphatically what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] says. This attack resembles very much the same purpose that was behind the attack upon the administration with regard to the landing of marines at Trau. It resembles also those other attacks upon the administration which have taken the form of a repetition of the vaguest and most ridiculous rumors, repeated here on the authority and dignity of a United States Senator, that the President of the United States had received a million dollars' worth of gifts in Europe, and other statements of that character, indicating a purpose to attack the administration instead of discussing the treaty now before the Senate.

Mr. President, what are the facts in this case? The Senate has before it a treaty and all the votes so far have indicated that the Senate will in some form ratify the treaty; that textually no change will be made in it; that the overwhelming majority of the Members of the Senate propose to ratify the treaty without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t"; that whatever, if anything, is done in the way of qualification will be done in the way of reservations.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me to proceed, I will yield in a moment.

Under those circumstances what do we find? In the annex, on page 129, it is stated that within 15 days from the coming into force of the present treaty, the German troops in the plebiscite area of Silesia shall be withdrawn and the troops of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy shall enter. It is very evident that we can not send troops from here to Silesia within 15 days after the ratification of the treaty. If they are to be sent there they have to be sent from some near-by post. The United States already has troops along the Rhine. What is more reasonable than that the War Department, already seeing what the Senate of the United States proposes to do, should move to those American camps that now exist along the Rhine in Germany sufficient troops so that when the Senate ratifies the treaty that obligation under the treaty may be carried out?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In just a moment.

The assertion or assumption that this is a matter done at the expense of the United States Treasury is unwarranted. The expenses of these troops are to be paid for by Germany. It is a part of the plan proposed in the treaty. It does not involve a national appropriation, and I can not understand the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and other Senators, who are committed against the treaty and do not propose to vote for it in any form, in constantly interfering with the rest of the Senate that do propose to ratify the treaty. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms and the Doorkeeper will remove from the galleries those who disturb the Senate by manifestations of approval. It is against the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we have not resigned our places in the Senate. We have our views which we express. I am opposed to the treaty for the very reason that when it is ratified, this thing which we are now discussing will be accentuated to such a marked degree that our troops will be constantly crossing the ocean for the purpose of performing service in Europe. That is the reason why I am opposed to it. It is for the very reason which is now the subject of discussion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator entertains, no doubt honestly, that opinion, and I entertain just as honestly the conviction that if the treaty is ratified and the league of nations goes into effect the result will be a reduction of armament, the result will be the preservation of peace, just as when the Monroe doctrine was declared by the United States. That doctrine involved the possibility of our sending troops, if necessary, to South America or Central America to prevent any European country planting itself on the North or South American continents or in Central America. That was the threat of the United States; but we never sent any troops there; we never appropriated any money to carry out the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine was sufficient of its own strength to prevent war; to prevent aggression on the Western Hemisphere. So I believe, even if the Senator from Idaho does not believe, when all the nations of the world practically unite in a statement that there shall be no wars of conquest anywhere in the world under penalty of suppression by the united action of the nations, that that will end wars of conquest, just as the Monroe doctrine ended wars of conquest which were threatened against the Western Hemisphere.

But I say, Mr. President, that we have before us a treaty, which the majority of the Senate have shown very definitely that they want to ratify in some form. The only question practically remaining before the Senate at the present time is whether those who want to ratify the treaty without any qualifications can in some way unite with those who want to ratify it with certain qualifications.

Mr. LENROOT, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. HALE addressed the Chair.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator from Nebraska know that the rejection of the amendments does not warrant the assumption, either upon the part of the Senator from Nebraska or of the War Department, that the Senate proposes to ratify the treaty with any obligation to send troops to Silesia or anywhere else upon the face of the earth? Does not the Senator know that the treaty can not be ratified with any such obligation imposed upon the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I do not know that, Mr. President.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, the Senator will find it out later if he does not know it now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My conviction is—and the ideas which I have had have been quite justified up to the present time—that the Senate will not adjourn without the ratification of the treaty. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States is going to back out of this war before it is finished; and the war is not finished until the German troops are out of Silesia and are supplanted by troops of the allied and associated nations, just as they have been supplanted by those troops upon the Rhine.

Senators might defeat the treaty, but if they do the war powers of the President will still continue. Under those war powers he can send those troops into Germany, be that understood.

I say, Mr. President, that when Senators who have already announced that they are going to vote against the treaty under any and all circumstances get up here and plead for and profess a desire to have more light about some other treaty and prod the administration to give out information that they want for some purpose they are not doing it for the purpose of a fair consideration of the treaty, but solely and only for the purpose of embarrassing the administration.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I merely desired to ask the Senator a question; but, premising that by a reference to the last utterance of the Senator, I have not been able to secure my own consent to an unqualified ratification of the treaty. I am in favor of amendments, if necessary, or reservations—it is immaterial to me which, so that we secure proper modifications. I can see no objection, however, to any Senator opposing the execution of the treaty before it is ratified.

The question, however, which I rose to ask is this: The Senator said that at the present time our Army and Navy are being used, as I understood him, in Europe. I should like to call his attention to the fact that there is a bill now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs, which is favored by the administration, giving the President the automatic power, without further legislation, under the machinery used in the late war, to conscript American soldiers for foreign service or any other service. I understand that such a bill is now pending before the Military Affairs Committee, and I should like to know what the object of it is, if it is not to send our soldiers to foreign countries to enforce any obligation which may be assumed in this treaty, for we have no need for an Army of 500,000 men at home. There is no threat or prospect of war other than may come upon us as a member of the league of nations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not advised as to what the administration has favored in reference to that matter; I have not been consulted, but I should hesitate very long before voting for a bill such as the Senator from Tennessee describes.

Neither do I suppose, Mr. President, that this country can immediately reduce its Army. Surely the Senator from Tennessee would not quote me as saying that, for I have never claimed it. The very terms of the covenant of the league of nations provide for a gradual reduction of armaments simultaneously by all the nations in the league under the advice of the council. Manifestly that can not be done suddenly. First, the council must canvass the matter and consult all of the nations, at least all that are members of the council. The nations represented on the council, nine in number, must unanimously agree upon the form and extent of the reduction. That takes time. Then, what the council recommends by its unanimous advice must be accepted by the various nations concerned. So that in the very nature of things disarmament, which we believe will be brought about under the league of nations, must be gradual and must come by united action in the council. That, in the very nature of things, is the only way disarmament can ever come.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is that disarmament to be enforced by troops that are to be raised by conscription?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee, I am sure, will recognize the truth of my statement when I say that no recommendation even for disarmament can be had until the representative of the United States and the representatives of the other members of the executive council unite in action. It could not occur then, so far as the United States is concerned, until Congress passes upon it and acquiesces in it. So I say that the disarmament of which I speak necessarily must come gradually and harmoniously and by the united action of all of the nine nations represented on the executive council.

I say again that if Senators think they can defeat the ratification of the treaty, they nevertheless leave the President with the war powers. He has sent troops, under the war powers, to Coblenz, and there is no reason why he could not send them farther if the war powers continue. The way to take away the war powers from the President of the United States is to ratify this treaty and bring about peace. A ratification of the treaty means a carrying out of the purposes of the war, one of which was to create the Kingdom of Poland. In creating the Kingdom of Poland, this little territory of Silesia, which contains a mixed population, must be allowed to vote as to which country it desires to belong. Silesia being required to vote, it is absolutely necessary that the great nations concerned should occupy it with a small military force and move the Germans out for the time being. That is provided for in the treaty; it is the inevitable proceeding; and it is not done at the expense of the United States, as the Senator from New York seems to imply, but it is done at the expense of Germany.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the purpose of sending troops there is to avoid any possible cause for sending troops there at some other time later on. The purpose is to conduct a peaceable plebiscite, so that the difficulties will be settled, and therefore there will be no occasion for trouble hereafter.

In reference to the remark of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], I happen to be a member of the Committee on Military Affairs; I think I ought to know something about the measures pending before that committee, and I know of no such measure as he has indicated. The propositions before the committee are for the reorganization of the Army on a peace basis, and there is no plan contemplated to send troops to foreign countries.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that there is no provision in the bill for drafting anybody.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes; there is, if you will turn to the bottom of page 40——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If you will turn to the bottom of page 40 of the bill, you will find a provision that in case of war the act of 1916 and all of the other drafting acts which we passed because of the exigencies of the present war shall be used for the purpose of drafting men.

Mr. OVERMAN. But that is only in case of war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but it is in the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not proposed to change the present method of raising an army in case an army is to be raised, but there is no provision in the bill which contemplates sending American troops into foreign countries unless in case of war.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. FALL. I understood the Senator to say that the purpose of sending troops to Silesia is to provide for a quiet election, and, I presume, to protect the electoral franchise in order to insure that a proper result is obtained. Does it not remind the Senator of an argument that has been used here repeatedly and confuted successfully by his colleagues? The very purpose of the proposal to send troops into the Southern States was that which is now advocated by the Senator in sending troops into Silesia, as I understand. Under the force bill it was proposed to send troops to make certain that in some districts in some of the Southern States an expression of opinion was properly obtained, and the Senator certainly, although not a member of the body at that time, was in full sympathy with the arguments of his colleagues against it. I am astonished to see the Senator from Florida now advocating exactly the same principle which he and his colleagues so successfully fought in order that they might maintain what they claimed to be white supremacy in the United States of America.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think there is any analogy whatever between the two conditions.

Mr. FALL. I ask the Senator if the purpose, as he announced it, is not to insure a quiet election and a full exercise of the electoral franchise and a proper return of the ballots after the votes are cast?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes. Here is a treaty, an agreement reached between contesting belligerents in this war, and one of the terms of the treaty is that there shall be a plebiscite in a portion of Poland to determine the preference of the people there residing. It is perfectly proper and legitimate that the parties entering into this agreement, coming to these terms, should see that they are fully and properly carried out, and that is the method agreed on for carrying it out; that is all.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment for another question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield the floor.

Mr. FALL. In reference to the Senator's statement that he saw no analogy between the provision of the treaty under discussion and the force bill referred to by me, and his allusion to the fact that this was a treaty provision, I desire to say that the so-called force bill, Mr. President, was offered under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which, as the Senator will recollect, provides that there shall be no discrimination in the matter of the electoral franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. In that case there was a constitutional provision; in this case there is a treaty provision not yet adopted.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. The Constitution provides also that the States shall conduct their own elections; the right of suffrage is a State matter entirely, and the manner of conducting elections is a State matter. So there was no occasion for a measure of the kind referred to by the Senator; but, as I have said, that has no relation whatever to the present question.

ADDRESS OF SECRETARY WILSON.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Secretary of Labor Wilson at the opening of the Industrial Conference in this city on the 6th of October. It is a very short address, and I am sure will be interesting to Senators.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon. My attention was diverted, and I should like to know what is the nature of the document.

Mr. ASHURST. In response to the interrogatory propounded by my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the speech delivered by Secretary of Labor Wilson at the opening of the Industrial Conference in this city on the 6th instant. I wish the Senator to indulge me long enough to state that, as he will recall, when I first came to the Senate some seven or eight years ago I was a very great sinner in the matter of introducing matters into the RECORD.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I know the Senator was.

Mr. ASHURST. But I believe three years have elapsed since I have asked to have anything printed in the RECORD in the way of letters and telegrams, with one or two exceptions. I have abandoned that sin; but I notice other Senators have taken my place. However, I do ask to be indulged in this instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, in view of the long abstention of the Senator from the habit, and the fact that it is doubtless an illuminating document, I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the address will be printed in the RECORD.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY HON. W. B. WILSON, SECRETARY OF LABOR, AT THE OPENING OF THE INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE, PAN-AMERICAN BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D. C., OCTOBER 6, 1919.

"Ladies and gentlemen of the conference, I regret very much that the illness of the President has made it impossible for him to be here to greet you. I had hoped that he might be here in person to bid you welcome, and by the clarity of his vision, the soundness of his judgment, and the felicity of his speech have assisted you toward the accomplishment of the great purpose he had in mind when this conference was called.

"The whole world is face to face with the most difficult peace-time problem it has ever had to deal with. The wastage of war has been tremendous. There has not only been the loss of millions of lives and the permanent disability of other millions of people, but there has been an extraordinary destruction of the material resources of the world. The power of replacement of the things destroyed has been seriously impeded by the conditions that constitute the aftermath of war. Industry has been disarranged by the processes of readjustment to the needs of peace, and commerce has been handicapped by insufficient shipping facilities, foreign exchange, and domestic uncertainty. Many countries are without stable government, and financial inflation in all of the commercial countries of the world has played havoc with the relative values of money, wages, and commodities.

"The effect of these things has been reflected in the high cost of living and the consequent demand for higher wage rates to meet the increasing burden of the family budget. Yet increases in the wage rate do not always give relief. There are but two ways by which the general standard of living of the wage-workers can be improved. One is by increased productivity, making more material available for wages. The other is by taking the means of increased compensation out of the profits of the employer. If wages are increased and profits remain the same, the burden is passed on to the consuming public in the form of an increased cost of living, and comes back in that form to the wageworker himself. No portion of improved living standards can come out of the profits of the employers unless there is profiteering.

"And what gives the opportunity for profiteering? The very conditions that we are confronted with to-day—the destructive agencies of war, the disarrangement of industry and commerce, and the unrest and high nervous tension of our people, resulting in a shortage of supply as compared with demand. The whole world is interested in returning to the highest productive efficiency, having due regard to the health, safety, and opportunities for rest, recreation, and improvement of those who toil. The more productive we are the sooner we will replace the wastage of war, return to normal price levels, and abolish the opportunity for profiteering. There can be no profiteering where the production is ample to meet the needs of the people of the world if there is a free flow of material from producer to consumer. It is only where the production is not sufficient for the needs of the people, or, when sufficient, where artificial obstructions impede proper distribution that there is any possibility of profiteering. Anything that restricts the highest efficiency commensurate with the physical, mental, and spiritual well-being of the workers tends to retard the progress of the country as a whole.

"For that reason we are all interested in the maintenance of industrial peace, but there can be no permanent industrial peace that is not based upon industrial justice. Just as international wrongs may accumulate to the point where war is necessary to bring relief, so industrial wrongs may make industrial conflict preferable to the further endurance of the wrongs imposed. Nor is it sufficient that either side to an industrial controversy should be the sole judge of what constitutes justice. The means must exist by which all men may know that justice has been secured. An imaginary wrong has all the force and effect of reality until it is shown that it is only imaginary. We have found ways of regulating all the other relations of mankind. Surely human intelligence can devise some acceptable method of adjusting the relationship between employer and employee.

"The right of any man to cease working for another for any reason that is sufficient to himself is the basic element of human liberty. The right of any person to refuse to operate his plant at any time he desires to do so is the exercise of a property right guaranteed by the Constitution. It does not follow that because these rights exist it is necessary to exercise them. They must nevertheless be safeguarded. Having done that and having devised the machinery by which justice can be secured and by which everybody at interest has the opportunity of knowing that justice has been secured, it is not likely that the right to cease work will be exercised by sufficient numbers, or the right to cease operating industrial plants will be carried to such an extent as to seriously affect the welfare of the balance of the people.

"There have been a number of great epochs in the spiritual and material advancement of mankind. The laws of justice laid down by Moses and the laws of love laid down by Christ stand out as the greatest of all ideals. Upon your shoulders rests a splendid responsibility. Before you the doors of opportunity are open, not to the acquisition of wealth or the attainment of fame, but to the greater achievement, the establishment of institutions that will promote the welfare of mankind down through the ages. If you, in the abundance of your combined wisdom and experience, can produce an acceptable document of this character, the results of your work will find a place in the hearts of men like the Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Emancipation Proclamation.

"In the name of the President of the United States and in his behalf, I wish you Godspeed in the great task before you."

Mr. FLETCHER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

FOREIGN SECURITIES IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BORAH. I offer a resolution at this time, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Senator will give us a chance to have one-half hour more of morning business.

Mr. BORAH. This is morning business. If it leads to any debate, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 214) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the Senate such facts or data as may be in his possession or available showing:

1. The amount of foreign bonds or securities which have been placed in this country since August 1, 1914, price paid, and the interest they bear.
2. By whom said bonds or securities were placed and by whom held at the present time.
3. The kind of securities or bonds and from what countries.
4. All data and facts, in other words, relating to the placing of foreign securities in this country since August 1, 1914, the nature of the securities, and by whom held, now available or within the possession of the Treasury Department.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber momentarily. I did not hear to whom the resolution was addressed.

Mr. BORAH. To the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the Secretary of the Treasury information concerning these matters?

Mr. BORAH. He has some information, and I only call for whatever he has.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As to the holding of European securities in the United States?

Mr. BORAH. I say, I only call for whatever information he has. Of course, necessarily he must have some information, because these bonds have been located. I am going to call on another department later.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is calling for information as to the holding of bonds in private hands in the United States?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; foreign securities.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the Senator says the Secretary of the Treasury knows where they are held?

Mr. BORAH. I assume he must have some knowledge of them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under what provision of the law?

Mr. BORAH. I simply assume that by reason of the fact that the owners must be paying taxes on them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not any objection. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Treasury has the information.

Mr. BORAH. I have put it in such language that, if he has not the data and information, it will not be embarrassing for him. I call for such information as he has.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, as there have been a number of telegrams and petitions presented here this morning in regard to the treaty of peace with Germany, I desire to call attention to a very large number of American citizens who are taking some steps regarding this matter, and in my judgment there is no element of our citizenship which ought to have more influence regarding this subject than the one to which I refer.

In this morning's New York Times I observe this article:

WOMEN JOIN LEAGUE FIGHT—COMMITTEE LAUNCHES NATION-WIDE CAMPAIGN FOR RATIFICATION.

A nation-wide campaign for the immediate ratification of the peace treaty was launched yesterday at a meeting of the Women's Non-Partisan Committee for the League of Nations, held at the Bijou Theater. Announcement was made that arrangements are being made whereby thousands of women who desire to see the Senate pass favorably on the treaty may have an opportunity of signing monster petitions to be sent to the Senate.

Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, chairman of the executive committee, said that the campaign is intended to last 10 days, and that telegrams had been sent to representative women in all the States asking their cooperation. The speakers at the meeting yesterday included Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, Katherine M. Davis, Mrs. Raymond Brown, and Mrs. Harriman.

"The greatest question before the American people is the decision concerning the league of nations," says the appeal sent out by the committee. "Its adoption is the hope of the world. Women are part of the American people and the people's opinion is our sovereign. Therefore we appeal to the women of America to make known their conclusions concerning the league of nations at Washington."

"If Senator LODGE had gone to Paris and brought back with him a covenant, we who are not partisans would have supported the covenant of LODGE just as we support the covenant President Wilson brought back," Mrs. Catt declared. "It is not a perfect instrument, and if it were perfect we would not know it."

There is no more bitterness expressed to-day toward the covenant, said Mrs. Catt, than there was expressed against the Constitution when it was up for adoption.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in a crisis of this kind, when we are at the conclusion, we hope, of the greatest war of the world's history, and when we are facing problems which must be of a vital character to our country, we ought not to ignore this expression of the earnest desire of this great mass of American citizenship. I think this is an appropriate time to call attention to the fact that the amendment to the Constitution of the United States granting them the right of suffrage has not been ratified. It seems to be assumed that this amendment to the Constitution will have been ratified before the next presidential election, but I want to say that it is not at all certain at this time that that will be the case.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but we only have 20 minutes more for morning business. If the Senator wishes to make any extended remarks, I must ask for the regular order. We have some reports of committees and other matters to present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia make the point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not make the point.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state his point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The point of order is that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] demanded the regular order, which was ordered, and other Senators were shut off from talking; and immediately the Senator from New Mexico has the privilege of talking, although the rest of us are denied it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it seems to me that the remarks of the Senator come with poor grace from him, because we all know that he this morning, out of order and with unanimous consent, occupied about an hour of the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand that the Senator from Florida had made a point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. President, I did address the Senate by unanimous consent, and then the Senator from Florida demanded the regular order. I did not demand it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And I am presenting what I believe to be in the nature of a petition to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That does not meet the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course, if the Senator insists upon his point of order, I have nothing further to say.

THE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. CALDER. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably Senate resolution 180, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths; and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

EMBARGO ON WHEAT.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate resolution 211, submitted by Mr. OWEN on the 13th instant, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry immediately investigate the reasons for the embargo on wheat and why transportation is not available to move the wheat of Oklahoma, Kansas, Texas, Colorado, and other States, and what steps the Grain Corporation has taken to obtain ships for the movement of such grain.

The said committee is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time and place as it may deem necessary; to require, by subpœna or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpœnas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or subcommittee thereof. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The expense thereof shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Is the resolution before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not before the Senate. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I thought the resolution was before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asked whether there was objection to the present consideration of the resolution, and the Chair heard none.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. At that point I rose and addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the request of the Senator from New Mexico for recognition.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There has been no vote taken upon the resolution, I believe.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. As I recollect, the President pro tempore stated that without objection the resolution was agreed to, and that was the order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are still in order.

COTTON CROP OF 1919.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 230) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare and issue a supplementary report on the condition of the cotton crop; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution just reported by him.

Mr. ASHURST. Let it be read first.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to prepare and publish, not later than November 2, 1919, a supplementary estimate of the condition of the cotton crop as of the date October 25, 1919.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, with the understanding that there is not to be any debate, I do not object. Otherwise, I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not give the Senator from Wisconsin any assurance upon that point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There will be no debate. If there is any, I will withdraw my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not going to take up the time——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? In view of the statement I made it seems to me the Senator should have stated whether he intended to occupy the 15 minutes remaining in debate. Of course, he is at perfect liberty to do that, but I submit that it is not quite fair to the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desired to state, Mr. President, that I wanted about two minutes to conclude what I was saying when objection was made by the Senator from Connecticut. It will not take up the remainder of the morning hour, and I have no intention of delaying the passage of this joint resolution; but I do want to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of the Federal amendment permitting women to vote.

I think it is extremely important at this time in the history of our country that this privilege should be granted, and I hope the Senators who are in favor of the amendment to the Constitution will use their utmost endeavors in bringing about the ratification of the amendment.

In order that Senators may be informed as to the present status of the amendment, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, an article from the New York Times, which purports to give, and I believe does correctly give, a statement of the present status of the amendment. If that may be published in the RECORD, I shall conclude what I have to say by again appealing to Senators to do what they can in their home States to bring about the ratification of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the communication will be printed in the RECORD as requested.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"OBSTRUCTING FEDERAL SUFFRAGE—OBDURATE OR RELUCTANT GOVERNORS MAY LOSE WOMEN THE VOTE IN NEXT PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

"ATTITUDE OF THE LEGISLATURES.

"Below are given the party proportions in State legislatures. Those marked with a star have ratified, 19 in number. Those marked with a cross constitute the suffragist list of States classed as "expected to ratify." They are 22 in number. Nineteen are necessary in order to attain the necessary two-thirds. Those States unmarked are classed as unpromising territory by suffrage leaders at Washington. Two of these, Florida and Tennessee, regarded as favorable to suffrage, are prevented from voting on an amendment until a new legislature is elected. It will be noted that all the States unmarked in this list are Southern:

Alabama, 100 per cent Democratic.
† Arizona, majority Democratic.
* Arkansas, 100 per cent Democratic.
† California, 3 to 1 Republican.
† Colorado, 2 to 1 Republican.
† Connecticut, 3 to 1 Republican.
† Delaware, 2 to 1 Republican.
Florida, 100 per cent Democratic.
Georgia, 100 per cent Democratic.
† Idaho, majority Republican.
* Illinois, majority Republican.
† Indiana, 3 to 1 Republican.
* Iowa, 6 to 1 Republican.
* Kansas, majority Republican.
† Kentucky, Democratic majority.
Louisiana, 100 per cent Democratic.
† Maine, 3 to 1 Republican.
† Maryland, Democratic-Republican equality.
* Massachusetts, 4 to 1 Republican.
* Michigan, majority Republican.
* Minnesota, majority Republican.
Mississippi, 100 per cent Democratic.
* Missouri, majority Democratic.
* Montana, 3 to 1 Republican.
* Nebraska, 8 to 1 Republican.
† Nevada, majority Republican.
* New Hampshire, 2 to 1 Republican.
† New Jersey, 5 to 4 Republican.
† New Mexico, 7 to 3 Republican.
* New York, 5 to 3 Republican.
North Carolina, 100 per cent Democratic.
† North Dakota, majority Republican.
* Ohio, 2 to 1 Republican.
† Oklahoma, majority Democratic.
† Oregon, 8 to 1 Republican.
* Pennsylvania, 8 to 1 Republican.
† Rhode Island, majority Republican.
South Carolina, 100 per cent Democratic.
† South Dakota, 14 to 1 Republican.
Tennessee, 100 per cent Democratic.
* Texas, 100 per cent Democratic.
* Utah, majority Republican.
† Vermont, majority Republican.
Virginia, 100 per cent Democratic.
† Washington, 10 to 1 Republican.
† West Virginia, majority Republican.
* Wisconsin, majority Republican.
† Wyoming, 3 to 1 Republican.

"Both Democratic and Republican speakers, in their flourishes for the women's vote in the next presidential election, assume as a foregone conclusion that the suffrage amendment will be ratified in ample time. They have taken their cue from the rosy claims put forth by suffrage leaders when ratification by one State was quickly followed by that of another. At the then rate of progress success did seem certain, but within the last few weeks obstacles have appeared which have changed the buoyant confidence of suffrage leaders in touch with the situation to one of increasing anxiety. In fact, earlier predictions have so gone awry that unless some unforeseen development takes place the amendment, if it does get through in time, is likely to do so by the closest of shaves.

"Two votes in Congress held up the passage of the suffrage amendment a year. Some of the suffrage leaders are apprehensive that by a similar narrow margin woman's participation in a presidential election may go over for four years. Outwardly there is still an air of confidence at woman's national headquarters at Washington, but in the inner councils the state of mind borders on one of alarm. There are two chief causes for uncertainty.

"One is that some of the western governors who made to representatives of the suffragists statements which were taken as assurances that extra sessions would be called are now deferring action on those extra sessions. They are even indicating in some instances that governors are doubtful of the advisability of summoning the legislature for the purpose desired.

"UNEXPECTED OPPOSITION.

"The other cause is adverse action by political parties or primaries in States where victory was counted as certain. Ratification by 19 States are necessary to win. In 15 of these special sessions are required. Of the 17 States which have ratified, 7 did so in regular sessions, and the special sessions brought about were in States where success was comparatively easy on account of highly favorable conditions. Thus seven of the special sessions were gained in the period between June 16 and August 2. Despite increasing effort, only two States—New Hampshire and Utah—were added to the list in September. Only one other State has a definite date set for a special session—Colorado. The governor of that State has announced that he will issue an official call for November 15. In a statement of the National Woman's Party put out recently at Washington 22 States were set down as 'expected to ratify.' Other States which have not ratified, while they are not absolutely given up, are, to say the least, not regarded as promising. Thus the chances to win are in the main centered in the list of 22. That list is composed of:

"Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Idaho, Indiana, Maine, Maryland, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Vermont, Washington, West Virginia, Wyoming, and Kentucky.

"In two of these States recent political events have altered the situation unfavorably since the original forecast was made. Maryland is one of the four States in the list which has a regular session of the legislature in 1920, the others being New Jersey, Rhode Island, and Kentucky. The present Legislature of Maryland has been polled by suffrage agents, and, according to them, would pass the ratification resolution if assembled, but the governor, Emerson C. Harrington, Democrat, flatly refuses to call a special session. New members of the legislature are to be elected in November. The Democratic organization in that State is put down as against suffrage, and the Republicans at their recent convention decided they would not vote in the legislature to ratify an amendment to the Federal Constitution until the question has first been submitted to the voters of the State.

"This drew an immediate protest from the suffragist leaders at Washington. The answer of the Maryland Republicans was that the action of the convention was intended to apply to the prohibition amendment, but that explanation did not alter the effect of the plank in the party platform. In any event, the suffrage amendment in this State is left to the uncertainties of an election campaign just now getting under way. If the Democrats win, some of them will evidently have to be 'converted'; if the Republicans are successful, they stand committed to popular referendum vote on suffrage, with the issue uncertain and the matter of time an adverse factor in getting a final action before registration day for the presidential election.

"SITUATION IN NEW JERSEY.

"In New Jersey, where also a new legislature is to be elected this fall, there is a situation somewhat similar, as the result of the recent primaries there. There, too, the Republicans are pledged to submit the amendment to a referendum before the legislature acts upon it, and the cost of a special election, with the hue and cry to keep down expenses going on, may, as in Maryland, be used by opponents to postpone the referendum until the next regular election, which would be that of the next presidential election. The Democratic candidate for governor in New Jersey has promised to stand for immediate affirmative action on the amendment if elected. To make the situation more vexing to the suffragists, the amendment would be ratified, they say, by the present members of the legislature, as shown by a careful poll, if the governor could be induced to call the legislature in special session. This Gov. William N. Runyon, Republican, refuses to do.

"In two other States in this preferred list governors who, it was hoped by the suffragists, would be won over to calling special sessions have taken such an emphatic position against doing so that the chance of 'converting' them has grown more and more unlikely. These executives are Gov. Marcus H. Holcomb, of Connecticut, and Gov. Percival W. Clement, of Vermont. If special sessions could be won in these States, say the suffragists, there is no doubt that the legislatures would ratify. The four States named are troubling the suffragists most; if they should all fail to ratify in time and none of the States outside of the 'expected to ratify' list should swing over to suffrage, then the amendment would not be made operative in time for the next presidential election.

"DILATORY TACTICS USED.

"In addition to these uncertainties there is a list of States where it was expected that calls for special sessions would have been announced by this time. Gov. William B. Stephens, of California, promised, according to the suffragists, that he would call a special session if necessary, but he has not acted, and the suffragists have been unable to get anything definite out of him. An issue has risen there to complicate the situation. Senator JAMES D. PHELAN, of that State, wants a special session also for another purpose—to pass legislation bearing on oriental immigrants. Gov. Stephens, it is reported, is opposed to inviting legislative action on the oriental question, thus strengthening his disinclination to call a special session.

"Gov. Thomas E. Campbell, of Arizona, Republican, was counted on to speed along the ratifications. The latest from him, suffragists at Washington report, is 'that unless his plans are changed he will call a special session, but for the present he has no intention of acting.' At the Salt Lake meeting of governors the suffragists announced that assurances had been obtained from Gov. John G. Townsend, of Delaware, Republican, that he would call a special session. Since then a fight has developed in Delaware over the repeal of a recently passed school law largely increasing taxes. Those in the Republican Party who oppose the repeal are against a special session, which might mean a reconsideration of the measure at this time.

"In Idaho Gov. D. W. Davis has added to the disappointment of the suffragists by putting off acting. They had him classed as one who had promised to give aid and comfort. The governor is a Republican. Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH, of Idaho, also a Republican, made one of the most determined fights in the Senate against the amendment. Gov. Ben Olcott, of Oregon, also listed as having given assurances that he would call a special session, is reported to be balking on the ground of the extra expense, especially as the women of his State already have full suffrage. This is true of other Western States where the calling of a special session is hanging fire. California, Washington, Wyoming, Idaho, Arizona, South Dakota, and Oklahoma all have full suffrage.

"Indeed, the suffragist leaders in Washington have met difficulty in arousing to aggressive fight for special sessions, with its extra expense, the women of States which already give women the vote. In order to overcome the obstacle of extra expense the suffragist agents are seeking pledges from the members of legislatures that they will waive pay and mileage. In the States which are yet without woman suffrage it is found more easy for women who want the ballot to go in and fight for it, but where governors take an unyielding position against suffrage the fighting may influence future campaigns, but does not move the obstinate executive to the desired immediate action.

"Both Democratic and Republican national leaders are on record for the suffrage amendment, and therefore the suffragists profess to be puzzled because these men have not used their influence on the governors, or if they have used it, why it has not been effective in causing the governors to do as the suffragists want them to.

"'Why,' asked a suffrage leader in Washington the other day, 'has not Chairman Hays, of the Republican national committee, induced his friend, Gov. James P. Goodrich, of Indiana, to call a special session? It ought to be all the easier, because some of our representatives received assurances from the Indiana governor that he would assemble the legislature for this purpose. Now, it is said he is on the uncertain list. And if the Democrats are equally desirous that we vote in 1920, why does not Chairman Cummings, of the Democratic national committee, get the Democratic governor of Maryland to call a special session in that State?'

"Between the Democrats and the Republicans the greater opportunity to be instrumental in the ratification of the amendment lies, it is admitted, with the Republicans. Of the 22 States 'expected to ratify' only five have Democratic governors—Kentucky, Maryland, Oklahoma, Nevada, and West Virginia. Two Democratic States which the suffragists were counting on have lined up in the anti column—Virginia and Georgia. Virginia will have a regular session in 1920, and the suffragists will continue the fight then. Two other Democratic States, Florida and Tennessee, which would be certain to ratify according to suffragist tallies, are prevented from doing so by laws that an amendment may not be ratified before a new legislature is elected, a requirement which practically amounts to a referendum in these States. To add to the embarrassment of Democratic leaders who are urging the ratification of the amendment, Gov. Ruffin G. Pleasant, of Louisiana, has issued an appeal to the other Southern States asking them to join in preventing ratification. Other Southern States the legislatures of which meet this winter are Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina. Suffragists assert that they have a chance in Mississippi and North Carolina.

"The total of this opposition to the suffrage amendment among southern Democrats may seem an undue load for national Democratic leaders to carry until it is taken into consideration that the Republicans have 15 governors to line up or account for by 'explanations' satisfactory to the suffragists. There is a suspicion among the suffragist leaders that some of the uncompromising antis among the Democrats and the Republicans are secretly obstructing the progress of the amendment, and that the demand made in some States that the question be referred to the people is in reality a plan to prevent ratification in time for the 1920 election.

"THE TIME LIMIT.

"That time is shorter than it seemed on first consideration. Some of the States have a poll-tax law which requires payment from four to six months in advance of the election. In Alabama the poll tax must be paid by February 1. In the greater number of the States registration is not more than one month in advance of the election, but in others—Oregon, Utah, and Indiana, for example—it is 60 days before election; in Arkansas and Mississippi, 4; in Rhode Island, 5; and in New Hampshire, 6, except in the city of Manchester. Therefore, according to a suffrage leader in Washington, if ratification is delayed much beyond the first of the year the operation of State election laws cuts down the number of women who could vote in the next presidential election.

"Looking at the situation as it is to-day the prospect that women will vote in the 1920 election would be dark, indeed, from the standpoint of the suffragist, were the fact not taken into consideration that wholly unlooked-for gains have been made by the suffragists in the past. Senators and Representatives at Washington who were listed as rank antis switched over to the pro column. The so-called 'pressure' system, with the 'card index' of Members, has got credit as the chief propulsive force. Soon after the passage of the amendment this system was extended to fit governors. At first it seemed that the governors would be as responsive as Senators and Representatives, but after some initial successes results have been disappointing. A suffrage leader in Washington said the other day in referring to some of the governors: 'You can not budge them.' This winter, however, during the months considered the most suitable for legislative sessions the suffragists, they say, expect to resume the headway they attained in the six weeks following the passage of the amendment and to continue their drive whatever the obstacles until success is won in time for the 1920 election."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISPOSAL OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED SHIPS.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I call up Senate resolution 212, which was carried over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 212) submitted by Mr. EDGE:

Whereas from time to time public announcement has been made of the placing of orders by private American companies for the construction of cargo ships by private yards; and

Whereas as a specific instance, during the past week a statement appeared in the public press to the effect that the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Co. had ordered by private yards the construction of eight tank ships; and

Whereas the United States Shipping Board, or Emergency Fleet Corporation, has full authority to dispose of ships now under their jurisdiction and control and included in this fleet are many tank ships apparently of the general type being obtained by private concerns from other sources; and

Whereas in the one instance cited approximately $18,000,000 could have been obtained by the Shipping Board through the sale of such ships to private concerns; and

Whereas one of the practical, effective methods for reducing the exorbitant taxation now prevailing is by covering back into the Treasury the hundreds of millions of dollars now tied up in the operations of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation; and

Whereas it now is high time that the Government be released from competition with private business, and that business be restored to private hands: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be instructed herewith to advise the Senate as to whether any effort was made to dispose of Government-owned ships to fill the order herein cited, and if so what prices were offered and asked for the same; and further to advise the Senate as to the number of ships that have been disposed of to private interests, with a description of the same and the prices received, and whether any offers have recently been received or are at present pending and the quotations involved, as well as to inform the Senate on the policy being followed in endeavoring to dispose of this type of Government property.

Mr. EDGE and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution. I really do not think that the last "whereas" clause on the first page ought to be included in the resolution; but I am quite positive that the last "whereas" clause, appearing on the second page, should not be included in the resolution, and I move to strike it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, strike out the following words of the preamble:

And whereas it now is high time that the Government be released from competition with private business, and that business be restored to private hands.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment. It states a policy and perhaps it is not entirely in place in this resolution of inquiry. While I believe that 90 per cent of the people of the United States agree with the policy so stated, perhaps it is hardly the time or the occasion to put the Senate on record, and with six minutes left of the morning hour, as I am particularly anxious to have the resolution passed so that we can at least get this information, I will not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, just a word. I do not agree to the inference that may be drawn from the last clause. Of course, if the Government should dispose of the ships and put the money in the Treasury we would have that much money in the Treasury, but we would have no ships. It is the same proposition, practically, as if owning an automobile I were to sell the automobile and put the money in my pocket. I would have the money, but I would have no automobile. The proposition is reasonably sound that if we cover back into the Treasury the hundreds of millions of dollars we have invested in ships we would have that much more money in the Treasury, but we would have no ships.

I am not in favor of disposing of any of these ships at this time, except such as are not efficient and might reasonably be disposed of in order to balance the fleet. If it was left with me, I would not sell a rowboat, especially not to any other country.

I think further that this information can be had without calling upon the Shipping Board by a resolution of this sort. It could be had, I think, upon request. As evidence of that, I am going to offer to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a communication received from the chairman of the Shipping Board a few days ago as to the plan for making sales and the number of sales that have been made up to this time. The information may be of some value, and I ask to have the communication inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, October 1, 1919.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your letter of September 26 re vessels sold, chartered, or allocated by the Shipping Board, I inclose herewith list of vessels sold up to the present time, together with statement of prices at which our vessels are disposed of. I am also sending you a copy of our triweekly report, which gives all allocations and charters of our vessels. Our policy is to charter only wooden and composite steamers, except in a few cases, where steel steamers are chartered to concerns to replace vessels which we have requisitioned from them and have still in service. When vessels are allocated by the board they are turned over to managers to be handled for us in connection with the securing of crews, furnishing of supplies, etc. For such services we pay a fee of $400 a month for each vessel up to and including five. If a company is assigned for management more than five boats, we pay them $350 a month for each vessel in excess of five. The operators of our ships—those who procure cargoes and attend to loading of same, etc.—are paid a commission of 2½ per cent of the gross freight list of general cargoes supplied by them and 1¼ per cent of the gross freight list of bulk cargoes supplied by them.

With the hope that this will enable you to furnish your constituent with the information desired, and with kind regards,

Yours, very truly,

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I move to amend the "whereas" in the preamble next before the last upon page 1 by inserting after the word "whereas" the words "it was stated in said article that," before the words "in the one instance cited." My reason for suggesting the amendment is that I have been objecting for several days to agreeing to resolutions in stating solemn and important facts in preambles to resolutions. I do not think it ought to be done.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I move to strike out the paragraph of the preamble near the bottom of page 1, extending over to page 2.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I object to that amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I make that motion for the reason so directly stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. It is a question of policy upon which we should not commit ourselves in this hurried manner. The Senator can get his information just as well without that preamble.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I can not see any reason in the world why the Senate of the United States should object to stating a fact. There is quite a distinction between the objection raised by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. The quotation of $18,000,000 was entirely from a newspaper article, and I think the suggestion and the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin were entirely proper. But the paragraph objected to by the Senator from Montana permit me to read:

Whereas one of the practical, effective methods for reducing the exorbitant taxation now prevailing is by covering back into the Treasury the hundreds of millions of dollars now tied up in the operations of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Certainly that is not a question of policy; that is a question of fact. Every dollar of governmental property disposed of, where the money is turned back into the Treasury, relieves us of that much in securing new income or new revenue to run the Government. The policy of running the merchant marine, the railroads, or any other agency in which the Government is now involved, is not here discussed; the mere statement is made that money being returned by the sale of governmental property or commodities must relieve the taxpayers of this country to that extent; and I can not see the slightest objection to drawing attention to it.

On a division, the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana was rejected.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I call up the resolution which was submitted by me asking for certain information from the Attorney General and which went over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 213) submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER on the 14th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States is requested to advise and inform the Senate the reason for the failure of the Department of Justice to take legal proceedings for the arrest and punishment of the various persons within the United States who during recent days and weeks, and for a considerable time continuously previous thereto, it is alleged, have attempted to bring about the forcible overthrow of the Government of the United States; who, it is alleged, have preached anarchy and sedition; who, it is alleged, have advised the defiance of law and authority, both by the printing and circulation of printed newspapers, books, pamphlets, circulars, stickers, and dodgers, and also by spoken word; and who, in like manner, it is alleged, have advised and openly advocated the unlawful obstruction of industry and the unlawful and violent destruction of property, in pursuance of a deliberate plan and purpose to destroy existing property rights and to impede and obstruct the conduct of business essential to the prosperity and life of the community.

Also, the Attorney General is requested to advise and inform the Senate why the Department of Justice has failed to take legal proceedings for the arrest and deportation of aliens who, it is alleged, have within the United States committed the acts aforesaid.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move to amend the resolution in line 2, page 1, by striking out the words "the reason for," and in line 3 the words "the failure of," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "whether or not"; and following the word "Justice," in line 3, I move to strike out the words "to take" and insert in lieu thereof the words "has taken"; and after the word "proceedings," in line 4, to insert the words "and if not, why not, and if so, to what extent," so that that portion of the resolution will read:

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States is requested to advise and inform the Senate whether or not the Department of Justice has taken legal proceedings, and if not, why not, and if so, to what extent, for the arrest and punishment, etc.

As the resolution now reads it simply condemns, in effect, the Department of Justice for a failure to do something which, according to my information, the Department of Justice not only has not failed to do, but is taking the necessary steps to accomplish. I believe the resolution would get the information which I think the Senator wants without the words I move to strike out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Florida by adding, at the close of the amendment which he has proposed, the words "and to what extent such proceedings have been taken, if at all."

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As so amended, while I prefer the original form, I will accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to suggest a further amendment. In line 6, page 2, I move to strike out the word "why" and insert in lieu thereof the words "whether or not"; and in line 6, after the word "has," strike out the words "failed to take" and insert in lieu thereof the word "taken"; and at the conclusion of the paragraph add the words "and if not, why not; and if so, to what extent," after the word "aforesaid," in line 9, so that the paragraph as amended will read:

Also, the Attorney General is requested to advise and inform the Senate whether or not the Department of Justice has taken legal proceedings for the arrest and deportation of aliens who, it is alleged, have, within the United States, committed the acts aforesaid; and if not, why not; and if so, to what extent.

Then, if the Senator from Washington desires to add "and to what extent such proceedings have been taken, if at all," those words can be added.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I accept the suggested amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States is requested to advise and inform the Senate whether or not the Department of Justice has taken legal proceedings—and if not, why not; and if so, to what extent—for the arrest and punishment of the various persons within the United States who, during recent days and weeks, and for a considerable time continuously previous thereto, it is alleged, have attempted to bring about the forcible overthrow of the Government of the United States; who, it is alleged, have preached anarchy and sedition; who, it is alleged, have advised the defiance of law and authority, both by the printing and circulation of printed newspapers, books, pamphlets, circulars, stickers, and dodgers, and also by spoken word; and who, in like manner, it is alleged, have advised and openly advocated the unlawful obstruction of industry and the unlawful and violent destruction of property, in pursuance of a deliberate plan and purpose to destroy existing property rights and to impede and obstruct the conduct of business essential to the prosperity and life of the community.

Also, the Attorney General is requested to advise and inform the Senate whether or not the Department of Justice has taken legal proceedings for the arrest and deportation of aliens who, it is alleged, have, within the United States, committed the acts aforesaid; and if not, why not; and if so, to what extent.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to consider the treaty of peace with Germany as in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the treaty, on page 217, and read as follows:

"Article 189.

"Articles, machinery and material arising from the breaking-up of German warships of all kinds, whether surface vessels or submarines, may not be used except for purely industrial or commercial purposes.

"They may not be sold or disposed of to foreign countries.

"Article 190.

"Germany is forbidden to construct or acquire any warships other than those intended to replace the units in commission provided for in Article 181 of the present Treaty.

"The warships intended for replacement purposes as above shall not exceed the following displacement:

Armoured ships	10,000 tons,
Light cruisers	6,000 tons,
Destroyers	800 tons,
Torpedo boats	200 tons.

"Except where a ship has been lost, units of the different classes shall only be replaced at the end of a period of twenty years in the case of battleships and cruisers, and fifteen years in the case of destroyers and torpedo boats, counting from the launching of the ship.

"Article 191.

"The construction or acquisition of any submarine, even for commercial purposes, shall be forbidden in Germany.

"Article 192.

"The warships in commission of the German fleet must have on board or in reserve only the allowance of arms, munitions and war material fixed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

"Within a month from the fixing of the quantities as above, arms, munitions and war material of all kinds, including mines and torpedoes, now in the hands of the German Government and in excess of the said quantities, shall be surrendered to the Governments of the said Powers at places to be indicated by them. Such arms, munitions and war material will be destroyed or rendered useless.

"All other stocks, depots or reserves of arms, munitions or naval war material of all kinds are forbidden.

"The manufacture of these articles in German territory for, and their export to, foreign countries shall be forbidden.

"Article 193.

"On the coming into force of the present Treaty Germany will forthwith sweep up the mines in the following areas in the North Sea to the eastward of longitude 4° 00′ E. of Greenwich:

"(1) Between parallels of latitude 53° 00′ N. and 59° 00′ N.; (2) To the northward of latitude 60° 30′ N.

"Germany must keep these areas free from mines.

"Germany must also sweep and keep free from mines such areas in the Baltic as may ultimately be notified by the Governments of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

"Article 194.

"The personnel of the German Navy shall be recruited entirely by voluntary engagements entered into for a minimum period of twenty-five consecutive years for officers and warrant officers; twelve consecutive years for petty officers and men.

"The number engaged to replace those discharged for any reason before the expiration of their term of service must not exceed five per cent. per annum of the totals laid down in this Section (Article 183)."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, at this time I desire to make a few observations. I believe I have not, so far, entered into the discussion of the peace treaty, league of nations, or any of the perplexing problems that are disturbing our national and commercial peace. I have heard some, and have read many, of the speeches in the Senate, and I feel moved to venture a few observations for record touching these engrossing subjects.

We have just successfully concluded the greatest war in the world's history. The ruthless sacrifice of human lives knows no historical parallel. The lavish expenditure of public funds and the wanton destruction of property and resources have plunged the world into appreciable proximity to the abyss of universal bankruptcy. The world has been on a prolonged debauch of expense—much of it necessary, but some of it unnecessary and wickedly extravagant. It is not strange, then, nor unnatural that after passing through such a hysteria of unparalleled excesses and intemperance we should to-day find ourselves confronted with the inevitable after effects, nor is it entirely surprising that the governments of the world should be beset by revolution and anarchy after experiencing these vicissitudes.

Our own United States, although fortunately farther removed from the disastrous after effects than are some of the other governments, still must consider herself a patient for serious treatment. The vote of the people has ordained us to be the physicians and the surgeons in the case. What remedies, then, are to be prescribed for the patient?

Although this Government of ours was conceived less than a century and a half ago, it now occupies an exalted position as a world leader. Her success has promoted her to the first positions in commerce, industry, form of government, and world power. Such rapid progress can not be termed accidental. There must be an underlying cause.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, I am ready to stand firmly and unequivocally upon the ground that our great success has been due fundamentally and primarily to our form of government. It has been brought about by our faithful adherence to the basic principles of self-government as promulgated by our forefathers and recorded in our Constitution. It has been the result of unswerving loyalty of the past to the precepts embodied by patriotic statesmen in such governmental monuments as Washington's Farewell Address, the Monroe doctrine, and Lincoln's Gettysburg speech. It occurs to me that these prescriptive remedies should be applied now. We have but to apply the foundational truths and elementary doctrines which have so successfully guided our ship of state in the past.

The right of the majority to rule and the supreme sovereignty of our Government are of first and vital importance in these teachings. I can not agree with the program outlined in a recent meeting of the communist party at Chicago to join with the Russian Bolsheviki in an international plot to overthrow this Government and to supplant it with their own Utopian mesmerisms. Nor can I agree with the attitude of Mr. Gompers, when he recently said before a Senate committee that if a law were passed to prevent railroad strikes he believed the railroad unions would strike, regardless of law and order. I can not agree with the Boston policemen who, in direct violation of their solemn oath to uphold the law, deserted their posts and relinquished the city to the mercy of hoodlums. I can not agree with the President, who, in his recent Des Moines speech, said that the league of nations covenant is bigger than the Senate and greater than our Government.

In fact, I can not agree with any man or any mob that would detract from the supreme sovereignty of our Government and its Constitution. To yield one iota from this position I would consider a flagrant violation of my oath of office which I swore to keep.

The signs of the day are ominous. Nearly every new edition of the press heralds a new declaration against the Government by some class, mob, or misguided individual. There is a too prevalent disposition to usurp the power and the will of the majority. I look with a jealous and a critical eye upon these encroachments. It is generally conceded that the treaty and the league of nations covenant is the most momentous question before the country to-day. And here the issue stands out in bold silhouette.

The President has clearly stated in his Des Moines address what in my opinion constitutes the main point in controversy—the league of nations is greater than the Government. Shall our Government be subservient and a vassal to an international affiliation? Shall we waive our heritage and independent treasure to enter a universal brotherhood in which we yield this inherent privilege? Or shall our Government and Constitution remain supreme, with the spirit and patriotism in which it was conceived and reared?

For my own part I deem it my duty and an honor to take my stand under the banner of the inviolable sovereignty of our Government and its constitutional rights. I can not agree with any international body which usurps or subtracts even one degree from the power and the independency of our nationality. I can not vote for the league of nations as proposed until it has been Americanized to recognize these principles.

My conscience demands that I stand for reservations which insure the freedom and the liberty of the American people which they have enjoyed since the Declaration of Independence. To my mind pursuing any other course would mean that our traditional liberty bell had been cleft in vain; that the horrors of the Civil War and the proclamation of emancipation had been for naught; that the blood and fiber of our American manhood had been spent to no avail on the battle fields of France.

My friends who favor this league in its present form may say that I lack vision; that I have failed to hear the voice of humanity crying out for love and peace throughout the universe. It may be said that I have neglected to gather the light and golden rule embodied in the Biblical lesson, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

It is said that the United States can not afford to recede from our past program of charity and philanthropy toward civilization in general; that we must accept the league as the next step up the ladder. To none of these statements and allegations can I accede. On the contrary, I believe that if our Nation has been an altruistic Samsonian giant in the past it will surely be shorn of its copious locks by sacrificing its birthright to join the present league of nations.

The moment we relinquish the fundamental foundations upon which our Nation has been constructed, then shall we commence to decay, crumble, and fall as a strong power for good.

History relates in tragic terms the steps which led to the downfall of the Grecian State, the Roman Empire, and many other governments which reigned supreme during their period of ascendancy. Is there not some value in the historian's records as to the rise and fall of nations? Radical changes have been the rocks upon which many a good ship of state has foundered. Let us not be unduly disturbed by the "voices in the air" which cry out for the adoption of extreme and radical ideas in our national policy. On the other hand, let us view the present problem sanely and practically, giving full weight and credence to the teachings and experiences of the past. Why imperil the bone and food which we have in our mouth by plunging headlong into the river after another bone, which may turn out to be only a shadow?

What nation, what man can question the unselfish motives and purposes of the United States? The battle for equal rights of men and the progress of civilization have ever been our creed. Our missionaries have pierced every corner of the globe. We have fed the starving hordes of the world. We have always exerted our good offices and diplomatic power against autocratic oppression and injustice. By the grace of God we were the final potent factor which turned defeat into victory in the late war. We allied ourselves on the side of justice and liberty, without coercion or duress. Our influence for good throughout the world will grow and become more effective in the future if followed under the policy of the past.

Discarding the fundamental rights which have made us a great Nation and a benevolent world power will undermine and weaken the whole fabric of our Government and its institutions. The plan will defeat itself. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. We can best answer the "voices in the air" and the needs of humanity by rejecting any league of nations which is not thoroughly Americanized lest it strike at the vitals of our very existence.

No one doubts the sincerity of purpose which inspires the proponents of this proposed league. No one can question the spirit and desire on the part of the President to solve the problem of world peace. The zeal and intensity with which he has worked in placing his idea before the people of the world characterize the depth of his feeling. His final physical exhaustion in pressing his convictions is to be lamented.

Again I wish to reiterate that the patriotism and sentiment of the men who favor this league can not be questioned. I grant that they are actuated by an ambition to be of service not only to their country but to the entire mundane sphere. But they go too far. They have blindly followed and have been carried past the stopping point of moderation and good, sound common sense, and unfortunately have allowed "visions" and mirages to enmesh them in an extreme and radical position.

Even the ancient Greek philosophers taught that success in life is found in a life of moderation. Pope in his Essay on Criticism sounds the same warning when he says:

> Be not the first by whom the new are tried,
> Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.

No one has greater horror of or antipathy toward war than I. It has been my lot to have taken part in one war, and the terrible consequences still remain graphically impressed upon my mind.

Then came the war and waste of our endeavors for the Cuban people and our acquisition of responsibilities in the Philippines.

And just now we are emerging from the greatest of all wars in expenditure of blood and treasure, the effects of which have placed an enormous burden upon our children, grandchildren, and those who come after them.

Even as worthy and justifiable as the causes of these wars were, nevertheless we have grown to appreciate all the more the terrible consequences of warfare.

If this league in its present form would prevent war and at the same time guarantee our national sovereignty I would hasten to proclaim approval. It is not a partisan issue. I insist that the issue is the broad question of Americanism. Democrats as well as Republicans have played major parts in preserving and upholding our Constitution and our institutions. President Grover Cleveland was just as emphatic in his denunciation of any attack upon our national sovereignty as was George Washington, the Father of his Country.

I commend and praise our President in that I believe he has given life to the germ of a plan which, with certain restrictions and alterations, tends toward the abolition of future wars. Full faith and credit are due every man for his honest endeavors, and I regret that I must oppose this document until it has been deprived of its denationalizing talons.

Let us turn to the league of nations covenant and contemplate some of the salient features which appear to me to circumvent our constitutional rights.

One of the pillars of our American Constitution has been the right of Congress to sanction any declaration of war. The right of the majority of the people, through Congress as their mouthpiece, to approve or disapprove the sending forth of American soldiers to possible death has never been questioned. And yet article 10 of this document, in my opinion, strangles the breath of life from this principle.

The first iniquitous consequences of this surrender have been felt even before we have ratified the treaty. American marines were sent recently against the Italians on the Dalmatian coast, under British direction, without the consent or knowledge of the Secretary of our Navy. The capitulation of the right of Congress to declare war is a direct and effective blow at our sovereignty. If we relinquish this right, then, indeed, the league of nations is greater than our United States.

There are those who say that we are only morally bound to protect the members against external aggression. This, to me, is a distinction without a difference. If our Nation is morally bound to do a thing, then certainly in all sincerity we should be legally bound. No sincere American can hold otherwise. Our national integrity and honor would not suggest any other theory. Granting this to be true, I see no other path but to make our position clear to the other contracting parties.

Our eminent doctors of law, in their primary lectures on contracts, lay special emphasis on the necessity of stating clearly and definitely all the terms of an agreement, leaving nothing to be inferred which may later give rise to serious controversy and lawsuit. Unless the minds of the contracting parties have met in one accord, then there is no contract. Let us set out in succinct and definable language the intent and purpose of our mind in order that we may perfect a noncontroversial agreement.

Supposing that the family of nations should not be to our liking and we should desire to change our international household surroundings; how are we to proceed? The terms of the covenant provide expressly that two years' notice shall be given and all obligations must have been completely fulfilled. Who is to determine our liabilities as to outstanding obligations?

Personally, I infer from the wording of the clause pertaining thereto that the league council would constitute the tribunal in this case. Again, I feel that we must make clear our intention and our purpose for the benefit of the other parties to the agreement. To place our application for withdrawal in the hands of the other nations for consent and favorable consideration I consider to be an abrogation of our national rights.

Articles 11 and 12 of this instrument bind us to submit to the league every circumstance threatening the good understanding of nations. A general provision of this character might cover a multitude of sins. Certainly learned doctors of contractual law would decree this statement to be ambiguous and deserving of elucidation.

Are we going to submit to the league the question of immigration from the Orient? Are we going to allow the league to fix and regulate our tariff schedule and foreign-commerce relationships? If the league council can govern our immigration, then by that privilege it can destroy us as a Nation. During these times of labor unrest we have already commenced to feel the need of strict control upon the influx of the foreign element. Rob Congress of her right to legislate and regulate her domestic problems and you strip our Republic of her sovereign rights.

The reference to the Monroe doctrine is vague and uncertain. Who shall interpret the metes and bounds of this document? Are we becoming so obsequious that we are willing to submit this historic masterpiece for interpretation by the very people against whom it was directed? I can not conceive of any such relinquishment on the part of the American Nation.

The language of our intent and purpose on this vital point should leave no question for doubt or argument. For years the principles set forth in the Monroe doctrine have kept us free from the entanglements and intrigues of the European Continent. It has served us well and faithfully, and I resent any attempt to compromise its strength and power.

The importance of cooperation and harmony between the United States and Great Britain has ever had its full weight with me. I regret that Great Britain's conception of this need did not seem to be of full strength when she demanded six votes to our one. True, it is said that five of these votes belong merely to a debating society. If they are not important, then why are they not relinquished by the British Government? If England is unable to do all of the debating for her colonies and possessions under her one major vote, then surely she ought not to expect the United States to do the debating for all of her 48 States and her possessions with a single voice.

The needs, resources, industries, and people of our Nation are as diversified and varied as those of England and her family of colonies. If the league of nations is to be an ideal brotherhood, then certainly England should feel safe and protected with the same voting power as is accorded to the United States.

There is scant reason for surprise that no particular remonstrance against the terms of the treaty has been voiced in England, France, or Japan.

If Great Britain could secure ratification of the document in its present form, she could credit herself with a diplomatic victory of colossal magnitude. To place the official star of authority upon the extended chest of Uncle Sam and to bid him police the world, including the numerous British foreign colonies, would be a signal triumph.

France displayed her faith in the league of nations by demanding a separate triple alliance in which the United States and Great Britain guarantee to come to her rescue in case of unprovoked external aggression.

Japan should feel elated at her diplomatic prize in her acquisition of the German rights in Shantung to the exclusion of China—one of our allies in a common cause.

Italy alone seems disgruntled. The effect of refusing to concede Fiume unreservedly to her is developing into a serious international muddle. And yet we are asked to accede without a word of protest.

The greater portion of the men who are considering this manuscript have passed the heyday of life. So far as we are personally concerned, the disastrous results of ratifying the treaty without reservations might be placated and possibly avoided. But my heart and sympathy go out to the youth of to-day, the governing Americans of to-morrow, and the generations of Americans to come. Individuals change, conditions change, and nations change. Our friend of to-day may be our enemy of to-morrow. Present acts of love and kindness may be euphemistically interposed for deeds of hatred and cruelty on the morrow.

The late wars serve well to enlighten us as to the rapidity and suddenness with which the international family may be upset and estranged. My earnest plea is that we may avoid the perils and pitfalls of the future; that we may retain unsullied and free from emasculation the supreme sovereignty of our Nation; that the precepts and advice of our forefathers may be heeded and preserved by strict obedience.

The various Army colors and standards and all the lesser symbols and emblems have been bowed in homage to the Presidents of our country as they have stood in review, but never has the American Flag been lowered to acknowledge the superiority of any man, creed, class, or nation. May she ever proudly and supremely hold her majestic sovereignty aloft as our highest object of appreciation and respect; may the glittering stars on her field of blue be never dimmed by a more powerful light; may the sanctity and purity of her stripes never find a rival. All our lives we have been protected and sheltered by the strength of this banner, and my prayer goes up to heaven that Father Time in his cycle of years may never reach the point where the American Flag must be dipped to the dust in homage to any international emblem.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the treaty and read as follows:

"The personnel discharged from the Navy must not receive any kind of naval or military training or undertake any further service in the Navy or Army.

"Officers belonging to the German Navy and not demobilised must engage to serve to the age of forty-five, unless discharged for sufficient reasons.

"No officer or man of the German mercantile marine shall receive any training in the Navy.

The fortifications now existing in this area shall be demolished and the guns removed under the supervisions of the Allied Governments and in periods to be fixed by them.

"No new fortifications shall be constructed within these limits. The armament of these defences shall not exceed, as regards the number and calibre of guns, those in position at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty. These stations may be used for commercial purposes, but only under the supervision of the said Governments, who will decide the wave-length to be used.

"Article 200.

"Until the complete evacuation of German territory by the Allied and Associated troops, the aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy in Germany freedom of passage through the air, freedom of transit and of landing.

"The German Government undertakes not to institute any exceptional proceedings against these persons or their families nor to take any repressive or vexatious measures of any kind whatsoever against them on this account.

"Article 221.

"The Allied and Associated Governments reserve the right to make the repatriation of German prisoners of war or German nationals in their hands conditional upon the immediate notification and release by the German Government of any prisoners of war who are nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers and may still be in Germany.

"Article 222.

"Germany undertakes:

"(1) To give every facility to Commissions to enquire into the cases of those who cannot be traced; to furnish such Commissions with all necessary means of transport; to allow them access to camps, prisons, hospitals and all other places; and to place at their disposal all documents, whether public or private, which would facilitate their enquiries;

"Article 223.

"Germany undertakes to restore without delay from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty all articles, money, securities and documents which have belonged to nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers and which have been retained by the German authorities.

"PART VII.

"PENALTIES.

"Article 227.

"The Allied and Associated Powers publicly arraign William II of Hohenzollern, formerly German Emperor, for a supreme offence against international morality and the sanctity of treaties.

"A special tribunal will be constituted to try the accused, thereby assuring him the guarantees essential to the right of defence. It will be composed of five judges, one appointed by each of the following Powers: namely, the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan.

"In its decision the tribunal will be guided by the highest motives of international policy, with a view to vindicating the solemn obligations of international undertakings and the validity of international morality. It will be its duty to fix the punishment which it considers should be imposed.

"The Allied and Associated Powers will address a request to the Government of the Netherlands for the surrender to them of the ex-Emperor in order that he may be put on trial."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I see that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has taken his seat in the Chamber. I was much interested this morning in the position taken by the Senator, that because the peace treaty is practically sure to be ratified, therefore it is entirely proper for us to take preliminary action thereunder. I do not agree with the position taken by the Senator, but I am very much pleased to hear him say that in all probability the peace treaty is going to be ratified. That indicates clearly to me, Mr. President, that the Senator and his followers are prepared to accept strong pro-American reservations, without which the treaty never can and never should be ratified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that may be a very interesting subject for debate, but this is not the proper time to discuss the matters to which the Senator refers. I believe in crossing a bridge when we get to it, and when we do get to that bridge we will cross it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator crossed the bridge this morning.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think probably it would hardly be proper to say that I crossed any bridge this morning. I think when we get to that bridge we will cross it, and I believe that when we get to it the only question remaining for the Senate to decide will be whether those who are in favor of ratifying the treaty with reservations can get together with Senators who are in favor of ratifying the treaty without reservations. I know that it is not possible for reservation Senators alone to ratify the treaty. It may be quite impossible for Senators who are opposed to all reservations alone to ratify the treaty. But I am very sure that Senators who are in favor of ratifying the treaty with reservations can not possibly do so by uniting with Senators who are determined to defeat the treaty under all circumstances. The only possible combination is the one I have stated.

The Secretary resumed the reading, and read as follows:

"Article 228.

"The German Government recognizes the right of the Allied and Associated Powers to bring before military tribunals persons accused of having committed acts in violation of the laws and customs of war. Such persons shall, if found guilty, be sentenced to punishments laid down by law. This provision will apply notwithstanding any proceedings or prosecution before a tribunal in Germany or in the territory of her allies.

"The German Government shall hand over to the Allied and Associated Powers, or to such one of them as shall so request, all persons accused of having committed an act in violation of the laws and customs of war, who are specified either by name or by the rank, office or employment which they held under the German authorities.

"Article 229.

"Persons guilty of criminal acts against the nationals of one of the Allied and Associated Powers will be brought before the military tribunals of that Power.

"Persons guilty of criminal acts against the nationals of more than one of the Allied and Associated Powers will be brought before military tribunals composed of members of the military tribunals of the Powers concerned.

"In every case the accused will be entitled to name his own counsel.

"Article 230.

"The German Government undertakes to furnish all documents and information of every kind, the production of which may be considered necessary to ensure the full knowledge of the incriminating acts, the discovery of offenders and the just appreciation of responsibility.

"PART VIII.

"REPARATION.

"Section I.

"GENERAL PROVISIONS.

"Article 231.

"The Allied and Associated Governments affirm and Germany accepts the responsibility of Germany and her allies for causing all the loss and damage to which the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her allies.

"Article 232.

"The Allied and Associated Governments recognize that the resources of Germany are not adequate, after taking into account permanent diminutions of such resources which will result from other provisions of the present Treaty, to make complete reparation for all such loss and damage.

"The Allied and Associated Governments, however, require, and Germany undertakes, that she will make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allied and Associated Powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an Allied or Associated Power against Germany by such aggression by land, by sea and from the air, and in general all damage as defined in Annex I hereto.

"In accordance with Germany's pledges, already given, as to complete restoration for Belgium, Germany undertakes, in addition to the compensation for damage elsewhere in this Part provided for, as a consequence of the violation of the Treaty of 1839, to make reimbursement of all sums which Belgium has borrowed from the Allied and Associated Governments up to November 11, 1918, together with interest at the rate of five per cent. (5%) per annum on such sums. This amount shall be determined by the Reparation Commission, and the German Government undertakes thereupon forthwith to make a special issue of bearer bonds to an equivalent amount payable in marks gold on May 1, 1926, or, at the option of the German Government, on the 1st of May in any year up to 1926. Subject to the foregoing, the form of such bonds shall be determined by the Reparation Commission. Such bonds shall be handed over to the Reparation Commission, which has authority to take and acknowledge receipt thereof on behalf of Belgium.

"Article 233.

"The amount of the above damage for which compensation is to be made by Germany shall be determined by an Inter-Allied Commission, to be called the Reparation Commission and constituted in the form and with the powers set forth hereunder and in Annexes II to VII inclusive hereto.

"This Commission shall consider the claims and give to the German Government a just opportunity to be heard.

"The findings of the Commission as to the amount of damage defined as above shall be concluded and notified to the German Government on or before May 1, 1921, as representing the extent of that Government's obligations.

"The Commission shall concurrently draw up a schedule of payments prescribing the time and manner for securing and discharging the entire obligation within a period of thirty years from May 1, 1921. If, however, within the period mentioned, Germany fails to discharge her obligations, any balance remaining unpaid may, within the discretion of the Commission, be postponed for settlement in subsequent years, or may be handled otherwise in such manner as the Allied and Associated Governments, acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in this Part of the present Treaty, shall determine.

"Article 234.

"The Reparation Commission shall after May 1, 1921, from time to time, consider the resources and capacity of Germany, and, after giving her representatives a just opportunity to be heard, shall have discretion to extend the date, and to modify the form of payments, such as are to be provided for in accordance with Article 233; but not to cancel any part, except with the specific authority of the several Governments represented upon the Commission.

"Article 235.

"In order to enable the Allied and Associated Powers to proceed at once to the restoration of their industrial and economic life, pending the full determination of their claims, Germany shall pay in such instalments and in such manner (whether in gold, commodities, ships, securities or otherwise) as the Reparation Commission may fix, during 1919, 1920 and the first four months of 1921, the equivalent of 20,000,000,000 gold marks. Out of this sum the expenses of the armies of occupation subsequent to the Armistice of November 11, 1918, shall first be met, and such supplies of food and raw materials as may be judged by the Governments of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers to be essential to enable Germany to meet her obligations for reparation may also, with the approval of the said Governments, be paid for out of the above sum. The balance shall be reckoned towards liquidation of the amounts due for reparation. Germany shall further deposit bonds as prescribed in paragraph 12 (c) of Annex II hereto.

"Article 236.

"Germany further agrees to the direct application of her economic resources to reparation as specified in Annexes, III, IV, V, and VI, relating respectively to merchant shipping, to physical restoration, to coal and derivatives of coal, and to dyestuffs and other chemical products; provided always that the value of the property transferred and any services rendered by her under these Annexes, assessed in the manner therein prescribed, shall be credited to her towards liquidation of her obligations under the above Articles.

"Article 237.

"The successive instalments, including the above sum, paid over by Germany in satisfaction of the above claims will be divided by the Allied and Associated Governments in proportions which have been determined upon by them in advance on a basis of general equity and of the rights of each.

"For the purposes of this division the value of property transferred and services rendered under Article 243, and under Annexes III, IV, V, VI, and VII, shall be reckoned in the same manner as cash payments effected in that year.

"Article 238.

"In addition to the payments mentioned above Germany shall effect, in accordance with the procedure laid down by the Reparation Commission, restitution in cash of cash taken away, seized or sequestrated, and also restitution of animals, objects of every nature and securities taken away, seized or sequestrated, in the cases in which it proves possible to identify them in territory belonging to Germany or her allies.

"Until this procedure is laid down, restitution will continue in accordance with the provisions of the Armistice of November 11, 1918, and its renewals and the Protocols thereto.

"Article 239.

"The German Government undertakes to make forthwith the restitution contemplated by Article 238 and to make the payments and deliveries contemplated by Articles 233, 234, 235 and 236.

"Article 240.

"The German Government recognizes the Commission provided for by Article 233 as the same may be constituted by the Allied and Associated Governments in accordance with Annex II, and agrees irrevocably to the possession and exercise by such Commission of the power and authority given to it under the present Treaty.

"The German Government will supply to the Commission all the information which the Commission may require relative to the financial situation and operations and to the property, productive capacity, and stocks and current production of raw materials and manufactured articles of Germany and her nationals, and further any information relative to military operations which in the judgment of the Commission may be necessary for the assessment of Germany's liability for reparation as defined in Annex I.

"The German Government will accord to the members of the Commission and its authorised agents the same rights and immunities as are enjoyed in Germany by duly accredited diplomatic agents of friendly Powers.

"Germany further agrees to provide for the salaries and expenses of the Commission and of such staff as it may employ.

"Article 241.

"Germany undertakes to pass, issue and maintain in force any legislation, orders and decrees that may be necessary to give complete effect to these provisions.

"Article 242.

"The provisions of this Part of the present Treaty do not apply to the property, rights and interests referred to in Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, nor to the product of their liquidations, except so far as concerns any final balance in favour of Germany under Article 243 (a).

"Article 243.

"The following shall be reckoned as credits to Germany in respect of her reparation obligations:

"(a) Any final balance in favour of Germany under Section V (Alsace-Lorraine) of Part III (Political Clauses for Europe) and Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty;

"(b) Amounts due to Germany in respect of transfers under Section IV (Saar Basin) of Part III (Political Clauses for Europe), Part IX (Financial Clauses), and Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways);

"(c) Amounts which in the judgment of the Reparation Commission should be credited to Germany on account of any other transfers under the present Treaty of property, rights, concessions or other interests.

"In no case however shall credit be given for property restored in accordance with Article 238 of the present Part.

"Article 244.

"The transfer of the German submarine cables which do not form the subject of particular provisions of the present Treaty is regulated by Annex VII hereto.

"ANNEX I.

"Compensation may be claimed from Germany under Article 232 above in respect of the total damage under the following categories:

"(1) Damage to injured persons and to surviving dependents by personal injury to or death of civilians caused by acts of war, including bombardments or other attacks on land, on sea, or from the air, and all the direct consequences thereof, and of all operations of war by the two groups of belligerents wherever arising.

"(2) Damage caused by Germany or her allies to civilian victims of acts of cruelty, violence or maltreatment (including injuries to life or health as a consequence of imprisonment, deportation, internment or evacuation, of exposure at sea or of being forced to labour), wherever arising, and to the surviving dependents of such victims.

"(3) Damage caused by Germany or her allies in their own territory or in occupied or invaded territory to civilian victims of all acts injurious to health or capacity to work, or to honour, as well as to the surviving dependents of such victims.

"(4) Damage caused by any kind of maltreatment of prisoners of war.

"(5) As damage caused to the peoples of the Allied or Associated Powers, all pensions and compensation in the nature of pensions to naval and military victims of war (including members of the air force), whether mutilated, wounded, sick or invalided, and to the dependents of such victims, the amount due to the Allied and Associated Governments being calculated for each of them as being the capitalised cost of such pensions and compensation at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty on the basis of the scales in force in France at such date.

"(6) The cost of assistance by the Government of the Allied and Associated Powers to prisoners of war and to their families and dependents.

"(7) Allowances by the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers to the families and dependents of mobilised persons or persons serving with the forces, the amount due to them for each calendar year in which hostilities occurred being calculated for each Government on the basis of the average scale for such payments in force in France during that year.

"(8) Damage caused to civilians by being forced by Germany or her allies to labour without just remuneration.

"(9) Damage in respect of all property wherever situated belonging to any of the Allied or Associated States or their nationals, with the exception of naval and military works or materials, which has been carried off, seized, injured or destroyed by the acts of Germany or her allies on land, on sea or from the air, or damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war.

"(10) Damage in the form of levies, fines and other similar exactions imposed by Germany or her allies upon the civilian population.

"ANNEX II.

"1.

"The Commission referred to in Article 233 shall be called 'The Reparation Commission' and is hereinafter referred to as 'the Commission'.

"2.

"Delegates to this Commission shall be nominated by the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. Each of these Powers will appoint one Delegate and also one Assistant Delegate, who will take his place in case of illness or necessary absence, but at other times will only have the right to be present at proceedings without taking any part therein.

"On no occasion shall the Delegates of more than five of the above Powers have the right to take part in the proceedings of the Commission and to record their votes. The Delegates of the United States, Great Britain, France and Italy shall have this right on all occasions."

The next amendment was, on page 261, annex 2, subsection 2, after the words "Delegates of," to strike out the words "the United States," so as to read:

Delegates of Great Britain, France, and Italy shall have this right on all occasions.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I understand that he is detained on official business.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] this morning seemed to voice the idea that those Senators who were not in favor of the pending treaty or who were opposed to its ratification were not entitled to be heard with reference to any proposed amendment or reservation thereof. I have never understood that to be the theory of legislation in this or any other parliamentary body. Legislation is a matter, first, of discussion, consideration, and generally of compromise. The treatment of a proposed treaty by this branch of the treaty-making power is that which would be given to proposed legislation.

I would feel myself derelict in my duty under my oath as a Senator if I did not propose to perfect any measure whatsoever which might be offered for adoption by this body, although I might be opposed to the measure itself and might have my mind definitely and firmly made up that, irrespective of the question whether amendments were or were not adopted, I should finally vote against the measure as a whole. In other words, I consider it to be one of the very gravest duties imposed upon a Senator in this body to perfect, if possible, legislation and to make it as innocuous as it can be made. Particularly in this instance do I consider that duty incumbent upon Senators, in view of the declarations such as we have heard from the Senator from Nebraska, who is leading the forces in favor of the treaty, that there is no question of the final adoption of the treaty.

Mr. President, I have had no hesitation whatsoever in expressing my views upon various provisions of this proposed treaty. I have none now. I have had nothing whatsoever to hide. I have not attempted to disguise my opinion nor to refrain from expressing here and elsewhere my determination upon the subject. I may reiterate that I am opposed to the constitution of the league of nations. As it is proposed, no reservation can cure, to my satisfaction, the fatal defects in that instrument. I had hoped that it might be possible to sever the proposed constitution of the league of nations from the so-called treaty of peace with Germany, which is, in fact, no treaty of peace whatsoever. I had then proposed that if, by the proper amendments, or what I considered proper amendments, my objections to the treaty itself were obviated, I should vote for the treaty. I say very frankly that in the face of the declared determination of the majority of the Senate to reject amendments to the treaty itself, I shall vote against the entire instrument. I shall, however, in pursuance of what I believe to be my duty, insist upon the amendments which I think proper to make the instrument as little disastrous or as innocuous as possible; and I conceive that in so doing I am merely performing my duty under my oath as a Member of this body.

In pursuance of that policy I have offered in the committee, and expect later to offer in the Senate, amendments to this treaty. I am perfectly aware of the fact that those amendments will be defeated. Therefore it may be asked why I should insist upon offering them. My purpose is that which I have declared, to perform my duty as I see it as a Senator.

We have seen some of the effects, at any rate; and while I have no aspirations to be considered a prophet, in my judgment you will see further effects of the offering of these amendments in the first place, of the discussion upon the amendments in the second place, and of the rejection of the amendments in the third place, some of the results with which you are faced now.

Mr. President, for the adoption of a council of representatives of the great nations of the world to meet in annual or semi-annual assembly for the discussion of world questions and reports to their several governments, I will vote heartily at any time. This was the first plank of the platform of the League to Enforce Peace. For the creation of a world tribunal, a court based upon the foundation upon which rests the department known as the judiciary department of this Government; for the creation of a world court which may deal with world questions as the Supreme Court of the United States deals with national questions, I will vote, should I have an opportunity. This is the second plank in the platform of the League to Enforce Peace. The entire platform has been scuttled and the money raised for propaganda in support of it has been diverted to assist in the creation of a purely political body with legislative powers, alone except as in article 11 executive powers may be found.

Mr. President, various amendments have been brought out of and submitted by the majority members of the Foreign Relations Committee for perfecting the body of this instrument. They have been voted down, one at a time. The pending amendment, brought out and reported favorably by the majority of the committee, will, of course, be rejected. I am now occupying the time of the Senate in this discussion, knowing the futility of the discussion so far as the immediate result will be indicated by a vote, but knowing that the discussion itself tends to inform the people of the United States of the shackles which are being placed upon them, of the obligations which are being imposed upon them, and which they must perform or repudiate in the future. I am determined that in so far as my weak voice can reach them they shall understand before it is ratified by this body not only the obligations which they are entering into for the future through the adoption of the covenant of the league of nations, but the obligations which they are assuming for the present through the adoption without amendment of the body of the treaty itself; and I, sir, as I say, not assuming to be a prophet, am performing what I believe to be my duty, in the assurance that I shall have no apology to make to the American people hereafter for my course or for my vote, nor any explanation, sir. I may be wrong.

Mr. President, the pending amendment is not the amendment which I would see adopted to the clause under consideration. Did I not know that it was absolutely futile, I should have offered the amendment in the original form in which I proposed it in the committee—to take the United States entirely out of the reparation commission, to assume none of the obligations imposed by the reparation articles, to decline any benefits whatsoever which might come to us through the reparation provisions, and to see that neither the United States nor its people for the next 30 years had any duty to perform under its provisions, which duty, when performed, will be, under the declaration of the President of the United States or of his peace commissioners, as testified under oath, performed for the benefit, not of the people of the United States but of the people of the other nations of the world.

As was well said by Brockdorff-Rantzau—and I may be declared to be pro-German for even mentioning the name; however, I refer to an official communication signed by Brockdorff-Rantzau and answered by M. Clemenceau as the president of the allied delegates—as was well said by Brockdorff-Rantzau upon reading the reparation articles, the reparation commission provided under this treaty has more power in Germany, or in the district under the control of the reparation commission directly, and in Germany as a whole, than was ever vested in the Kaiser, in the German Empire, in the Reichstag, or in all the several States of Germany combined.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator, with pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator from New Mexico happen to remember that it is not only over Germany that the reparation commission exercises such vast powers, but it is over other countries as well; as, for instance, it is within the function of the reparation commission to determine how much money Belgium owes the United States up to the 11th day of November, 1918, when the armistice was signed, and to decide that the United States shall accept German bonds in payment therefor.

Mr. FALL. I thank the Senator for adding to what I have been saying so important a suggestion, which, of course, is based upon the written terms of the treaty.

Mr. President, I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying to you that these terms never will be performed. No force, no power known to man, can compel performance of the terms which you are agreeing to enforce, except the bayonets of an overwhelming military force in Germany for 30 years.

There are no terms of peace in the reparation commission provisions of the treaty, but there is perpetual war and strife in every line of them. No country can ever remain a country, no country can retain any element of sovereignty, and perform as you provide that Germany shall perform. The only way that you can compel Germany to perform is by the bayonets of your soldiers. Still we are told that those of us who oppose this peace treaty should not even offer an amendment to mitigate in some degree the inequalities which are visited upon the United States at least by the terms of the covenant.

The amendment proposed here is simply to the effect that the American member of the commission of seven may attend the meetings of the commission, but that with the exception of his right to vote in every instance on the article dealing with the distribution of the German merchant fleet and ships now constructed or to be hereafter constructed, which she agrees to turn over to certain powers in proportion to their tonnage laws, in which article the United States is interested, he shall cast his vote and bind the people of the United States to no other provision, unless he receives direct instructions from his Government as to the casting of his vote upon that subject. In other words, that no commissioner appointed by the President of the United States, either by and with the consent of the Senate or not, shall bind this Government by his vote in regulating the affairs and conducting the supergovernment of Germany, except as he may be directly instructed by his Government at home. It simply provides that the commissioner whom we may name shall perform all his duties as the treaty itself provides that he shall perform one of them.

As the United States declared that it expected no part of the sums provided for in the nature of reparation to be given to us, and would accept no part of them, and as such declaration was not joined in by our associates, the allied powers, it became necessary, in carrying out their purposes, to see that our vote did not affect the question or influence their commissioners upon the scaling of the indebtedness. The provision therein is to the effect that upon any vote with reference to reducing the reparation demanded, the commissioner shall receive direct instructions from his Government before agreeing to any such reparation. The proposed amendment simply applies the same principle or rule to the performance of the other duties of this commissioner.

Mr. President, I shall not undertake to go at length into the discussion of the various provisions of the reparations articles. I have referred to them in broad terms alone.

There is an army provided for in these reparation commission articles to enable the reparation commission to enforce its orders. There is a further provision that the reparation commission itself may recruit armed forces of its own.

Mr. President, many of our earnest colleagues, actuated undoubtedly by as patriotic motives as those which I claim, sincerely believe that through some form of reservations somewhere they may reach the same object that I have in view in offering what is denounced so often as a textual amendment. Some of them have declared, with reference to other amendments which have been rejected here on the same line, that they would not vote to reject those amendments were they not convinced that the same object could be reached by a reservation.

It has not been my good fortune, Mr. President, to see the proposed reservations. In a discussion yesterday with one of the reservationists I was shown one of those reservations. I can say very frankly that there was an immediate disagreement between that Senator and myself as to the effect of his proposed reservation. That being the case, Mr. President, being in hopes that a reservation itself would reach the object, and therefore, if the amendment were defeated, that I might, through a vote cast for the reservation, assist in the perfecting of this instrument, but disagreeing entirely with the gentleman who supports the amendment as to its effect, I asked him who would construe the reservation.

Of course, I may say, frankly, that I can not agree with any part of the contention that is advanced by some Senators in regard to the applicability of any precedents which have been cited here with reference to the effect of reservations as saving the United States in treaties. I can not agree for one moment with those Senators who maintain that the reservations contained in the Algeciras agreement form a precedent which would be binding in the consideration of this treaty. I can not agree for a moment with the contention that the reservations contained in such agreements as those adopted at the last

Hague convention form a precedent for the consideration or construction of similar reservations or other reservations attached to this agreement.

In the first place, Mr. President, you join supine government and a political body of some character. A subject under dispute, or a dispute not under dispute, is brought up properly for consideration by the council. You have adopted a reservation of some character concerning the various subjects under discussion. If you have compelled the other allied and associated powers, who, together with the United States, constitute a perpetual majority in the council, to agree with your reservation before you have entered the council chamber, you may claim some degree of safety. If you have not required, as a condition precedent to the exchange of ratifications, that you should be joined affirmatively in those reservations by those who with you will constitute a majority of that council forever, then I say to you that the construction of the reservation itself is a point of dispute to be settled under the terms of the league covenant, and under the terms of the league covenant, if you refuse to submit that very question to arbitration, automatically the council itself takes cognizance of it, and you are precluded from voting upon it.

Again, you will be met by the proposition that, as a matter of fact, your reservations constitute amendments, in effect, to the treaty itself. Every reservationist who has spoken here declared himself as not opposed to the principle covered by these amendments and declared that he would vote for the amendments if he did not think that we could cover the same proposition by a reservation. Every one of those gentlemen agrees with the contention which inevitably would be made that the reservations themselves form amendments, and they will be met by the assertion, "We have not agreed to the amendments," and they will be met by the assertion that "You yourselves have agreed how this covenant of the league should be amended, and until it is so amended we will construe your amendments for you."

You have constituted no great court to whom the question could be submitted. You have submitted to a political body, and by the terms of your submission exclude yourselves from participating in the vote.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. LENROOT. What body does the Senator think would have the right to construe?

Mr. FALL. The council of the league of nations.

Mr. LENROOT. Under what authority?

Mr. FALL. Under the general authority vested in it. I know the Senator does not agree with my construction, even of the Constitution of the United States. I know he does not agree that there is any power in this council. I do not agree with him. I think there is. I think there is general power in this council and in the assembly. We disagree fundamentally upon the constitutional propositions involved—earnestly and sincerely, of course, but fundamentally. There is no point of agreement. The Senator is absolutely sincere, undoubtedly, in his contention that a reservation will reach the point which he agrees with me should be reached by reservation or textual amendment. The appeal to me that a textual amendment means the summoning of the peace council again, the submission to the peace council itself of the acceptance or rejection of the amendments, and that it will require time, is no appeal to my judgment, when the rights, possibly the destiny, certainly the future of the people of the United States are involved, and in view of the fact particularly that the peace council are now in session.

Mr. President, I offered an amendment to the provision with reference to upper Silesia, excluding the United States from taking part in the deliberations or actions or decisions of the commission appointed under the terms of this peace treaty. Until the terms of the treaty are ratified, until the treaty itself becomes effective in so far as the United States is concerned, the armistice agreed upon between the United States and its associates upon one part and Germany upon the other is in full force and effect unless denounced or violated.

Has there been any violation, in so far as we know or have been informed, of the terms of the armistice with reference to upper Silesia? None whatsoever. There has been none, I will say flatly. The armistice is in effect. The armistice proposes and disposes of the use of the armed forces of the United States until the treaty comes into effect.

It now develops in the discussion which took place this morning that the Chief of Staff of the United States has informed the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this body that the 5,000 troops who sailed last night or this morning, destined for upper Silesia, are being sent across the water to that point under the war power of the President of the United States and under the additional authority which he conceives to have been conferred upon him indirectly by the rejection by this body of the amendment offered by myself and voted down a few days since. This broad assertion is made despite the declaration of Senators voting against the amendment at the time that they cast their votes, or a few moments prior thereto, and repeated again this morning by the eminent Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], that the treaty itself could not be ratified unless a reservation shall be adopted which will protect the United States, as the amendment offered by myself, if it had been adopted, would have reached that purpose.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I interrupted the Senator a few moments ago in calling attention to the idea of acceptance of German bonds by the reparation commission, and I made a statement which, I think, after closer examination of the text of the treaty, I was scarcely warranted in making. I was misled by the language of a document prepared for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which undertook to state the powers of the reparation commission. In this document it is stated that—

> One of the powers of the reparation commission is to determine the debt Belgium owes to the allied and associated powers incurred up to November 11, 1918, with interest at 5 per cent and accept German bonds of this amount.

I find upon an examination of article 232, of which this is supposed to be a condensed statement, that acceptance of German bonds in the amount is an acceptance for Belgium and not an acceptance for those to whom Belgium owes any debt.

Mr. FALL. However, it comes under the provision to which the Senator referred.

Mr. KNOX. Yes. I wanted to make that correction.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I am very glad that the Senator from Pennsylvania has made that correction, because that statement had been heretofore made on the floor of the Senate on several occasions and I was not able to find it. The provision to which the Senator now refers is on page 249 of the text.

Mr. KNOX. Article 232; and I think a clear reading of the article is that the bonds are to be accepted for Belgium and does not release Belgium from her obligations to a country to which she shall owe any debt.

Mr. POMERENE. In no sense does it release Belgium from her obligation to us except as it may be paid.

Mr. KNOX. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. FALL. I did not understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to make the point that it relieved Belgium from any debt. It was with reference to the powers of the Reparation Commission which we were discussing. I will say in passing that the Senator will find further, in some of the articles of the treaty, that Germany is compelled to underwrite certain other indebtedness of her allies in this war which has not yet been ascertained in so far as we know—of course over her very serious protest.

Mr. President, we are confronted by the remarkable condition of affairs that, upon the one hand, the disposition of the troops of the United States may be made in any manner whatsoever that the war power declares so long as the status of war exists, and, upon the other, we have the defeat of an amendment in this body, coupled with the declaration that the treaty itself can not go into effect unless the amendment is covered by proper reservations, and that the latter action is additional authority for the use of the armed forces of the United States, as it is not provided that they shall be used in the armistice under which we are now operating.

But, sir, even under the contention as specifically announced, I was yet astounded this morning to have the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], who was leading so well those forces which are lined up in favor of the adoption of the treaty, as he says, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," announce a doctrine which I have heard hinted at once or twice in this Chamber, in effect, that the status of war having been created, no power could interfere with the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, in the disposition of the armed forces of the United States.

I called attention once before, two years or more ago, in this body, to what that declaration meant, that it meant in terms, in effect, or in spirit that, having declared war on Germany, neither the Congress of the United States nor any other power could prevent the President of the United States, in his discretion, from invading the neutral countries of Switzerland or Holland if, in his judgment, as military commander, he could best reach the forts in Germany through such invasion. That was the doctrine. The doctrine is that being not yet, as the Senator says, at peace—that is, under his construction of what peace means, not having ratified the present treaty—the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, may, in violation of the armistice entered into and under which we are operating, take the soldiers from Illinois and other States in the Union and send them, not to the Rhine Provinces, which are provided in the armistice itself to be occupied for a certain length of time, but send them across Germany or through the free city of Danzig and occupy Upper Silesia until such time as he sees fit to withdraw them. That is a peculiar theory of government to me, Mr. President; but in its logical outcome, logically followed by the commissioners of the United States of America, in concert with other members of the supreme council, a day or two since in declaring economic and armed war upon Russia, with whom we have never been at war.

I read from the Associated Press dispatches in the morning papers as follows:

LONDON, October 16.

The text of the note of the supreme council inviting Germany to participate in the blockade of Russia, as published in the Berlin Tageblatt and reprinted by the Daily Herald, shows that Norway, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Finland, Spain, Switzerland, Mexico, Chile, Argentina, Colombia, and Venezuela have been invited to initiate measures to prevent their nationals from engaging in any trade whatever with Bolshevik Russia. The measures are thus enumerated:

First. Refusal of permission to sail to every ship bound for a Russian Bolshevik port and the closing of all ports to ships from Bolshevik ports.

Second. Similar regulations to be adopted with regard to all goods destined for Russia by any other route.

REFUSE PASSPORTS AND CREDIT.

Third. Passports will be refused to all persons to or from Bolshevik Russia. Isolated exceptions may be made by agreement of the allied and associated powers.

Fourth. Measures will be taken to hinder banks from granting credit to commercial undertakings in Bolshevik Russia.

Fifth. Every Government will refuse its nationals any facilities of intercourse with Bolshevik Russia, whether by post or wireless telegraphy.

This, of course, constitutes economic war. The following constitutes armed warfare:

Marshal Foch added the following instruction:

"Inform the German Government that the British and French men-of-war in the Gulf of Finland will continue to blockade Bolshevik ports and detain from the moment they come in sight ships bound for Bolshevik ports."

Mr. President, this is the modern doctrine of the freedom of the seas so strenuously contended for through the windows of the White House. Every neutral ship sailing from a South American port for a Russian port called a Bolshevik port, whatsoever the port may be, so denominated by some representative of the supreme council, must understand that if encountered by a British or a French man-of-war it will not be allowed to enter the port of destination.

A blockade is a war measure, and is defined in international law as war. The Congress of the United States is not called upon to act. Why? Because, under the modern theory so eloquently announced, we are in a state of war.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what the logical consequence is. Having by proper declaration of war once entered a state of war with any nation, automatically the President of the United States, being constituted military dictator of the United States, has the power vested in him to declare war or to commit an act of war against any other country under the heavens.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is not charging me with making any such statement as that, is he?

Mr. FALL. I will read from the Senator's remarks of this morning and see whether or not I was justified in even intimating that he held that opinion:

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My conviction is—and the ideas which I have had have been quite justified up to the present time—that the Senate will not adjourn without the ratification of the treaty. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States is going to back out of this war before it is finished; and the war is not finished until the German troops are out of Silesia and are supplanted by troops of the allied and associated nations, just as they have been supplanted by those troops upon the Rhine.

Continuing, the Senator said:

I say, again, that if Senators think they can defeat the ratification of the treaty, they nevertheless leave the President with the war powers. He has sent troops under the war powers to Coblenz, and there is no reason why he could not send them farther if the war powers continue. The way to take away the war powers from the President of the United States is to ratify this treaty and bring about peace.

Of course, there may be no other way; but I may say to some of the Senators who are so fond of reservations that there is a way set forth in the Declaration of Independence of the United States by which war powers can be taken away without the ratification of this treaty. God deliver us from the necessity of appealing to the ultimate powers of the people of the United States to change forcibly their form of government!

Mr. President, where are we? We have, under the provisions of the Constitution, declared war against Germany; we are in a state of war; the President has war powers; and therefore we are justified in declaring war, economic and armed, against Russia. We have declared, in violation of the terms of the armistice, that we are justified in occupying portions of Germany which were not provided to be occupied in the armistice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator will realize that we did not make the armistice; it was made by the President of the United States. He has the power to change it, for it is purely a military proceeding.

Mr. FALL. That is another astounding proposition. Any Senator who holds such ideas as those just expressed has an absolute contempt for the Constitution of the United States, an absolute contempt for the form of government adopted by our fathers and so far preserved by the sword of our people, or else has no conception whatsoever of what our form of government is, with its three coordinate branches of government. Apparently, as I understand the doctrine enunciated, he has no conception of international law or of the rules of war among civilized nations. The Senator does not seem to realize that an armistice takes the place of a treaty of peace for the time being when it is in effect and that a violation of it by us would be as much to be condemned by all as would be a violation of its terms by Germany.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator has shown no violation of it.

Mr. FALL. But the Senator himself is suggesting that the President of the United States has the right to violate it in the face of all decency and of the history of the civilized world.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not at all. I say the President of the United States in conjunction with the other powers has the power to amend it and they have done so. What are you going to do about it? They have amended it.

Mr. FALL. I deny the statement. The President has done nothing of the kind in conjunction with the other powers. If he has, it does not mitigate his offense against decency and civilization, but condemns his associates in the perpetration of such an offense. Germany is a party to the armistice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, Germany has agreed to the modification.

Mr. FALL. Germany, sir, has not agreed to the modification that we might occupy the territory referred to with troops, except as she has been compelled to do so under duress and at the point of the bayonet.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Everything is under duress.

Mr. FALL. Oh, yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. She has agreed to it.

Mr. FALL. Well, we have not in this treaty. Now, you appeal to the war powers of the President, that he, as Commander in Chief, can modify or obviate or set aside an armistice, and in the next breath you appeal to the terms of the treaty itself as modifying the terms of the armistice; and the treaty, in so far as we and the President of the United States are concerned, has not been ratified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator misunderstands, I think. The armistice was made by the authority of the President of the United States for the United States and by the proper authorities for Great Britain, for France, for Italy, and for Japan. It was made with Germany, which assented to it under compulsion. Now all of those powers except the United States and Japan have ratified the treaty; all of those powers, including the United States and including Germany, have agreed to the modification of the armistice by which soldiers go into Silesia during the plebiscite. The other nations have taken that action under the treaty and the President has taken it under his war power. If we have not the treaty in force the President has his war power, and he has exercised his war power.

Mr. FALL. Precisely; but the Senator from Nebraska, from my point of view, instead of extricating himself from his extraordinary construction of the war powers of the President of the United States, becomes more deeply involved, for, reduced to its logical conclusion, his construction is that the President of the United States is a military dictator. I am not prepared to disagree with that construction, but as to the constitutionality or legality of that state of affairs I do disagree. That it is a fact—and the Senator has stated that it is a fact—that we are operating in this instance under a military dictatorship I agree. That there is a military dictatorship in this country legally and constitutionally or by the consent of the people of the United States I disagree.

Mr. President, let us follow this matter a little further. So long as we are at war the President under his war powers can even violate an armistice. When are we at peace? The Senator says when we ratify this treaty. Why, Mr. President, we solemnly declared war against the Austro-Hungarian Empire; we have now pending a treaty of peace terminating the war with Austria, and we have in process of negotiation a treaty of peace supposed to be intended to terminate the war with what remains of Hungary, Hungary having been broken up and divided. A portion of it goes to or is claimed by Bulgaria; another portion to Roumania, or she lays claim to it; and still another portion, I believe, we have agreed to turn over to Czechoslovakia and to the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. So long as we have not entered into a treaty of peace with the Hungarian portion of the former Austrian Empire the dictatorship in this country and throughout the world will continue. That is the logical argument and the only deduction which can be made from the war powers of the President as construed by his representatives here. Therefore if we can just hold off peace with any other country the President of the United States can continue to exercise his war powers abroad; he can continue to send our troops wherever he may please; he can continue to take part in a declaration of war upon an ally—for Russia was an ally of the United States—and under his war power, being a military dictator, he can use the armed forces of the country anywhere he pleases and not be guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor and be subject to punishment by impeachment through the Congress of the United States. I deny any such construction.

Mr. President, are the soldiers, if they are needed in blockading Bolshevik ports, to be diverted from their destination in Upper Silesia to Russia to join or cooperate with the American forces already there unconstitutionally? How long are the war powers to continue? Yet we are told that if we adopt textual amendments to this treaty we will prevent the United States having peace with the world; that if we reject the proposition for American representation on the reparation commission—and the Austrian treaty and every other treaty which is now being prepared is full of commissions; and an army of Bullitts or representatives of like or other character, I suppose, are in training for the positions which you are assisting to constitute for them—a like result will follow. We are told as an excuse for the violation of the Constitution, as an excuse for a usurpation of power by the President of the United States such as no other man in the United States ever dared to undertake, that finally Germany will pay for the occupation by our troops of Upper Silesia. A wonderful argument, Mr. President; an argument that will appeal, of course, to Senators in this body.

We were told by the same Senator a few days ago that amendments ought not to be adopted because a very great financial benefit was to be derived—I think he mentioned about $1,000,000,000—by the United States, if not directly by reparation, through the indirect operation of the reparation commission in Germany. Exalted sentiments, worthy of indorsement by those who believe that no textual amendments should be adopted to this treaty, worthy of those who hold to the belief that by a mere declaration of war against an enemy the President of the United States automatically becomes a military dictator, and that so long as war is not ended by a written document adopted by the military dictator and ratified by us without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," his military war powers continue and he can command the forces of the United States to invade or its ships to blockade a friendly country!

Mr. President, I have little more to say. In so far as I am concerned, the vote may be taken. With the amendments proposed and those which will be proposed defeated, I shall vote against the ratification of the entire treaty; and in doing so I again say that in my heart I have the assurance that I shall never be called upon to apologize or feel of myself the necessity for apologizing to any people anywhere for my action and my vote, nor will it be necessary for me to explain it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall not undertake to discuss the distinction between reservations and textual amendments; but I believe I can show that if the Senate desires to attain the objects sought to be accomplished by this amendment it can be done by the resolution of ratification, in which the Senate must provide for the appointment of all representatives of the United States under the treaty and define their powers and duties, or such provision may be made by joint resolution or statute.

Now, let us see what this amendment is. It is an amendment of Annex 2, page 261, section 2, which section provides:

> Delegates to this commission shall be nominated by the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. Each of these powers will appoint one delegate and also one assistant delegate.

The next part of the section reads as follows:

> On no occasion shall the delegates of more than five of the above powers have the right to take part in the proceedings of the commission and to record their votes. The delegates of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy shall have this right on all occasions.

In the pending amendment the words "United States" are stricken out and the following words added:

> The delegate of the United States shall have no vote in the proceedings of the commission except concerning a matter wherein such delegate is specifically instructed by his Government to take part in proceedings of the commission and to cast and record the vote of the United States thereupon; but shall always have such right when Annex III to the reparation clauses or any section thereof is under consideration.

Annex III provides for the disposition of the shipping, and so forth.

The Senate should, and undoubtedly will, pass a resolution ratifying the treaty and providing that the Congress of the United States will provide by statute for the appointment of its representatives under the league and treaty on commissions, boards, courts, or to any other position; establishing the extent to which the United States is to participate therein; and defining and limiting the powers and duties of the various commissioners and representatives, mode of appointment; and finally providing that until that is done no one shall represent the United States under the league or treaty.

It is the clear duty of the Senate of the United States to pass such a resolution, and it devolves upon the Congress to provide by statute for those appointments and to define the powers and duties of our representatives and the extent of their participation in these commissions. If that is done—and I know it has been considered by the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, who has given a great deal of attention to it—there is absolutely no necessity for this amendment.

This amendment provides that the delegate of the United States shall have no vote in the proceedings of the commission except concerning a matter wherein such delegate has been instructed by his Government to take part in the proceedings of the commission and to cast and record the vote of the United States thereupon. The Congress will by statute provide that, and the resolution of ratification should give notice that the Congress will do it by statute; and until that is done we shall have no commissioners, and we shall have no delegate.

Of all amendments within my knowledge, this is the least necessary.

The foreign countries are not at all interested in how we shall appoint our representatives. That is for the Congress to decide; and the resolution of ratification, I believe, can and should thoroughly protect the United States until Congress has acted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon amendment numbered 45, proposed by the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. DIAL. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] are absent on official business. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state amendment numbered 45.

The SECRETARY. On page 261, in Annex II, article 2, after the words "the delegates of," on line 3 of the last paragraph, strike out the words "the United States" and the comma, so that it will read:

The delegates of Great Britain, France, and Italy shall have this right on all occasions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to inquire of the Senator from New Mexico whether he desires a yea-and-nay vote on these amendments?

Mr. FALL. It is immaterial to me, Mr. President. So far as I am concerned, I have no desire in the matter. There is no question but that the amendments will be defeated.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us have a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. FALL. Other Senators ask for a yea-and-nay vote. I suggest to Senators that the yea-and-nay vote on one amendment is sufficient.

Mr. PENROSE. I will withdraw the request.

Mr. FALL. Then I have no request to make. The amendments heretofore have been defeated, and this amendment will be defeated, I presume, by approximately the same vote. So I agree that a viva voce vote may be had.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state amendment numbered 46.

The SECRETARY. On line 4 of the last paragraph on page 261, after the word "occasions" and the period, it is proposed to insert the following words:

The delegate of the United States shall have no vote in the proceedings of the commission, except concerning a matter wherein such delegate is specifically instructed by his Government to take part in proceedings of the commission and to cast and record the vote of the United States thereupon, but shall always have such right when Annex III to the reparation clauses or any section thereof is under consideration.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the treaty and read as follows:

"The Delegate of Belgium shall have this right on all occasions other than those referred to below. The Delegate of Japan shall have this right on occasions when questions relating to damage at sea, and questions arising under Article 260 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) in which Japanese interests are concerned, are under consideration. The Delegate of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State shall have this right when questions relating to Austria, Hungary or Bulgaria are under consideration.

"Each Government represented on the Commission shall have the right to withdraw therefrom upon twelve months notice filed with the Commission and confirmed in the course of the sixth month after the date of the original notice.

"Such of the other Allied and Associated Powers as may be interested shall have the right to appoint a Delegate to be present and act as Assessor only while their respective claims and interests are under examination or discussion, but without the right to vote.

"4.

"In case of the death, resignation or recall of any Delegate, Assistant Delegate or Assessor, a successor to him shall be nominated as soon as possible.

"5.

"The Commission will have its principal permanent Bureau in Paris and will hold its first meeting in Paris as soon as practicable after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and thereafter will meet in such place or places and at such time as it may deem convenient and as may be necessary for the most expeditious discharge of its duties.

"6.

"At its first meeting the Commission shall elect, from among the Delegates referred to above, a Chairman and a Vice-Chairman, who shall hold office for one year and shall be eligible for re-election. If a vacancy in the Chairmanship or Vice-Chairmanship should occur during the annual period, the Commission shall proceed to a new election for the remainder of the said period.

"7.

"The Commission is authorised to appoint all necessary officers, agents and employees who may be required for the execution of its functions, and to fix their remuneration; to constitute committees, whose members need not necessarily be members of the Commission, and to take all executive steps necessary for the purpose of discharging its duties; and to delegate authority and discretion to officers, agents and committees.

"8.

"All proceedings of the Commission shall be private, unless, on particular occasions, the Commission shall otherwise determine for special reasons.

"9.

"The Commission shall be required, if the German Government so desire, to hear, within a period which it will fix from time to time, evidence and arguments on the part of Germany on any question connected with her capacity to pay.

"10.

"The Commission shall consider the claims and give to the German Government a just opportunity to be heard, but not to take any part whatever in the decisions of the Commission. The Commission shall afford a similar opportunity to the allies of Germany, when it shall consider that their interests are in question.

"11.

"The Commission shall not be bound by any particular code or rules of law or by any particular rule of evidence or of procedure, but shall be guided by justice, equity and good faith. Its decisions must follow the same principles and rules in all cases where they are applicable. It will establish rules relating to methods of proof of claims. It may act on any trustworthy modes of computation.

"12.

"The Commission shall have all the powers conferred upon it, and shall exercise all the functions assigned to it, by the present Treaty.

"The Commission shall in general have wide latitude as to its control and handling of the whole reparation problem as dealt with in this Part of the present Treaty and shall have authority to interpret its provisions. Subject to the provisions of the present Treaty, the Commission is constituted by the several Allied and Associated Governments referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above as the exclusive agency of the said Governments respectively for receiving, selling, holding, and distributing the reparation payments to be made by Germany under this Part of the present Treaty. The Commission must comply with the following conditions and provisions:

"(a) Whatever part of the full amount of the proved claims is not paid in gold, or in ships, securities and commodities or otherwise, Germany shall be required, under such conditions as the Commission may determine, to cover by way of guarantee by an equivalent issue of bonds, obligations or otherwise, in order to constitute an acknowledgment of the said part of the debt.

"(b) In periodically estimating Germany's capacity to pay, the Commission shall examine the German system of taxation, first, to the end that the sums for reparation which Germany is required to pay shall become a charge upon all her revenues prior to that for the service or discharge of any domestic loan, and secondly, so as to satisfy itself that, in general, the German scheme of taxation is fully as heavy proportionately as that of any of the Powers represented on the Commission.

"(c) In order to facilitate and continue the immediate restoration of the economic life of the Allied and Associated countries, the Commission will as provided in Article 235 take from Germany by way of security for and acknowledgment of her debt a first instalment of gold bearer bonds free of all taxes and charges of every description established or to be established by the Government of the German Empire or of the German States, or by any authority subject to them; these bonds will be delivered on account and in three portions, the marks gold being payable in conformity with Article 262 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty as follows:

"(1) To be issued forthwith, 20,000,000,000 Marks gold bearer bonds, payable not later than May 1, 1921, without interest. There shall be specially applied towards the amortisation of these bonds the payments which Germany is pledged to make in conformity with Article 235, after deduction of the sums used for the reimbursement of expenses of the armies of occupation and for payment of foodstuffs and raw materials. Such bonds as have not been redeemed by May 1, 1921, shall then be exchanged or new bonds of the same type as those provided for below (paragraph 12, c, (2)).

"(2) To be issued forthwith, further 40,000,000,000 Marks gold bearer bonds, bearing interest at 2½ per cent. per annum between 1921 and 1926, and thereafter at 5 per cent. per annum with an additional 1 per cent. for amortisation beginning in 1926 on the whole amount of the issue.

"(3) To be delivered forthwith a covering undertaking in writing to issue when, but not until, the Commission is satisfied that Germany can meet such interest and sinking fund obligations, a further instalment of 40,000,000,000 Marks gold 5 per cent. bearer bonds, the time and mode of payment of principal and interest to be determined by the Commission.

"The dates for payment of interest, the manner of applying the amortisation fund, and all other questions relating to the issue, management and regulation of the bond issue shall be determined by the Commission from time to time.

"Further issues by way of acknowledgment and security may be required as the Commission subsequently determines from time to time.

"(d) In the event of bonds, obligations or other evidence of indebtedness issued by Germany by way of security for or acknowledgment of her reparation debt being disposed of outright, not by way of pledge, to persons other than the several Governments in whose favour Germany's original reparation indebtedness was created, an amount of such reparation indebtedness shall be deemed to be extinguished corresponding to the nominal value of the bonds, etc., so disposed of outright, and the obligation of Germany in respect of such bonds shall be confined to her liabilities to the holders of the bonds, as expressed upon their face.

"(e) The damage for repairing, reconstructing and rebuilding property in the invaded and devastated districts, including reinstallation of furniture, machinery and other equipment, will be calculated according to the cost at the dates when the work is done.

"(f) Decisions of the Commission relating to the total or partial cancellation of the capital or interest of any verified debt of Germany must be accompanied by a statement of its reasons.

"As to voting, the Commission will observe the following rules:

"When a decision of the Commission is taken, the votes of all the Delegates entitled to vote, or in the absence of any of them, of their Assistant Delegates, shall be recorded. Abstention from voting is to be treated as a vote against the proposal under discussion. Assessors have no vote.

"On the following questions unanimity is necessary:

"(a) Questions involving the sovereignty of any of the Allied and Associated Powers, or the cancellation of the whole or any part of the debt or obligations of Germany;

"(b) Questions of determining the amount and conditions of bonds or other obligations to be issued by the German Government and of fixing the time and manner for selling, negotiating or distributing such bonds;

"(c) Any postponement, total or partial, beyond the end of 1930, of the payment of instalments falling due between May 1, 1921, and the end of 1926 inclusive;

"(d) Any postponement, total or partial, of any instalment falling due after 1926 for a period exceeding three years;

"(e) Questions of applying in any particular case a method of measuring damages different from that which has been previously applied in a similar case;

"(f) Questions of the interpretation of the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty.

"All other questions shall be decided by the vote of a majority.

"In case of any difference of opinion among the Delegates, which cannot be solved by reference to their Governments, upon the question whether a given case is one which requires a unanimous vote for its decision or not, such difference shall be referred to the immediate arbitration of some impartial person to be agreed upon by their Governments, whose award the Allied and Associated Governments agree to accept.

"14.

"Decisions of the Commission, in accordance with the powers conferred upon it, shall forthwith become binding and may be put into immediate execution without further proceedings.

"15.

"The Commission will issue to each of the interested Powers, in such form as the Commission shall fix:

"(1) A certificate stating that it holds for the account of the said Power bonds of the issues mentioned above, the said certificate, on the demand of the Power concerned, being divisible in a number of parts not exceeding five;

"(2) From time to time certificates stating the goods delivered by Germany on account of her reparation debt which it holds for the account of the said Power.

"The said certificates shall be registered, and upon notice to the Commission, may be transferred by endorsement.

"When bonds are issued for sale or negotiation, and when goods are delivered by the Commission, certificates to an equivalent value must be withdrawn.

"Interest shall be debited to Germany as from May 1, 1921, in respect of her debt as determined by the Commission, after allowing for sums already covered by cash payments or their equivalent, or by bonds issued to the Commission, or under Article 243. The rate of interest shall be 5 per cent. unless the Commission shall determine at some future time that circumstances justify a variation of this rate.

"The Commission, in fixing on May 1, 1921, the total amount of the debt of Germany, may take account of interest due on sums arising out of the reparation of material damage as from November 11, 1918, up to May 1, 1921.

"In case of default by Germany in the performance of any obligation under this Part of the present Treaty, the Commission will forthwith give notice of such default to each of the interested Powers and may make such recommendations as to the action to be taken in consequence of such default as it may think necessary.

"18.

"The measures which the Allied and Associated Powers shall have the right to take, in case of voluntary default by Germany, and which Germany agrees not to regard as acts of war, may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and in general such other measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances.

"19.

"Payments required to be made in gold or its equivalent on account of the proved claims of the Allied and Associated Powers may at any time be accepted by the Commission in the form of chattels, properties, commodities, businesses, rights, concessions, within or without German territory, ships, bonds, shares or securities of any kind, or currencies of Germany or other States, the value of such substitutes for gold being fixed at a fair and just amount by the Commission itself.

"20.

"The Commission, in fixing or accepting payment in specified properties or rights, shall have due regard for any legal or equitable interests of the Allied and Associated Powers or of neutral Powers or of their nationals therein.

"21.

"No member of the Commission shall be responsible, except to the Government appointing him, for any action or omission as such member. No one of the Allied or Associated Governments assumes any responsibility in respect of any other Government.

"22.

"Subject to the provisions of the present Treaty this Annex may be amended by the unanimous decision of the Governments represented from time to time upon the Commission.

"23.

"When all the amounts due from Germany and her allies under the present Treaty or the decisions of the Commission have been discharged and all sums received, or their equivalents, shall have been distributed to the Powers interested, the Commission shall be dissolved.

"ANNEX III.

"1.

"Germany recognises the right of the Allied and Associated Powers to the replacement, ton for ton (gross tonnage) and class for class, of all merchant ships and fishing boats lost or damaged owing to the war.

"Nevertheless, and in spite of the fact that the tonnage of German shipping at present in existence is much less than that lost by the Allied and Associated Powers in consequence of the German aggression, the right thus recognised will be enforced on German ships and boats under the following conditions:

"The German Government, on behalf of themselves and so as to bind all other persons interested, cede to the Allied and Associated Governments the property in all the German merchant ships which are of 1,600 tons gross and upwards; in one-half, reckoned in tonnage, of the ships which are between 1,000 tons and 1,600 tons gross; in one-quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the steam trawlers; and in one-quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the other fishing boats.

"The German Government will, within two months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, deliver to the Reparation Commission all the ships and boats mentioned in paragraph 1.

"3.

"The ships and boats mentioned in paragraph 1 include all ships and boats which (a) fly, or may be entitled to fly, the German merchant flag; or (b) are owned by any German national, company or corporation or by any company or corporation belonging to a country other than an Allied or Associated country and under the control or direction of German nationals; or (c) are now under construction (1) in Germany, (2) in other than Allied or Associated countries for the account of any German national, company or corporation.

"4.

"For the purpose of providing documents of title for the ships and boats to be handed over as above mentioned, the German Government will:

"(a) Deliver to the Reparation Commission in respect of each vessel a bill of sale or other document of title evidencing the transfer to the Commission of the entire property in the vessel, free from all encumbrances, charges and liens of all kinds, as the Commission may require;

"(b) Take all measures that may be indicated by the Reparation Commission for ensuring that the ships themselves shall be placed at its disposal.

"5.

"As an additional part of reparation, Germany agrees to cause merchant ships to be built in German yards for the account of the Allied and Associated Governments as follows:

"(a) Within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Reparation Commission will notify to the German Government the amount of tonnage to be laid down in German shipyards in each of the two years next succeeding the three months mentioned above.

"(b) Within two years of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Reparation Commission will notify to the German Government the amount of tonnage to be laid down in each of the three years following the two years mentioned above.

"(c) The amount of tonnage to be laid down in each year shall not exceed 200,000 tons, gross tonnage.

"(d) The specifications of the ships to be built, the conditions under which they are to be built and delivered, the price per ton at which they are to be accounted for by the Reparation Commission, and all other questions relating to the accounting, ordering, building and delivery of the ships, shall be determined by the Commission.

"Germany undertakes to restore in kind and in normal condition of upkeep to the Allied and Associated Powers, within two months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, in accordance with procedure to be laid down by the Reparation Commission, any boats and other movable appliances belonging to inland navigation which since August 1, 1914, have by any means whatever come into her possession or into the possession of her nationals, and which can be identified.

"With a view to make good the loss in inland navigation tonnage, from whatever cause arising, which has been incurred during the war by the Allied and Associated Powers, and which cannot be made good by means of the restitution prescribed above, Germany agrees to cede to the Reparation Commission a portion of the German river fleet up to the amount of the loss mentioned above, provided that such cession shall not exceed 20 per cent of the river fleet as it existed on November 11, 1918.

"The conditions of this cession shall be settled by the arbitrators referred to in Article 339 of Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways) of the present Treaty, who are charged with the settlement of difficulties relating to the apportionment of river tonnage resulting from the new international régime applicable to certain river systems or from the territorial changes affecting those systems.

"Germany agrees to take any measures that may be indicated to her by the Reparation Commission for obtaining the full title to the property in all ships which have during the war been transferred, or are in process of transfer, to neutral flags, without the consent of the Allied and Associated Governments.

"8.

"Germany waives all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals in respect of the detention, employment, loss or damage of any German ships or boats, exception being made of payments due in respect of the employment of ships in conformity with the Armistice Agreement of January 13, 1919, and subsequent Agreements.

"The handing over of the ships of the German mercantile marine must be continued without interruption in accordance with the said Agreement.

"9.

"Germany waives all claims to vessels or cargoes sunk by or in consequence of naval action and subsequently salved, in which any of the Allied or Associated Governments or their nationals may have any interest either as owners, charterers, insurers or otherwise, notwithstanding any decree of condemnation which may have been made by a Prize Court of Germany or of her allies.

"ANNEX IV.

"1.

"The Allied and Associated Powers require, and Germany undertakes, that in part satisfaction of her obligations expressed in the present Part she will, as hereinafter provided, devote her economic resources directly to the physical restoration of the invaded areas of the Allied and Associated Powers, to the extent that these Powers may determine.

"2.

"The Allied and Associated Governments may file with the Reparation Commission lists showing:

"(a) Animals, machinery, equipment, tools and like articles of a commercial character, which have been seized, consumed or destroyed by Germany or destroyed in direct consequence of military operations, and which such Governments, for the purpose of meeting immediate and urgent needs, desire to have replaced by animals and articles of the same nature which are in being in German territory at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty;

"(b) Reconstruction materials (stones, bricks, refractory bricks, tiles, wood, window-glass, steel, lime, cement, etc.), machinery, heating apparatus, furniture and like articles of a commercial character which the said Governments desire to have produced and manufactured in Germany and delivered to them to permit of the restoration of the invaded areas.

"3.

"The lists relating to the articles mentioned in 2 (a) above shall be filed within sixty days after the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"The lists relating to the articles in 2(b) above shall be filed on or before December 31, 1919.

"The lists shall contain all such details as are customary in commercial contracts dealing with the subject matter, including specifications, dates of delivery (but not extending over more than four years), and places of delivery, but not price or value, which shall be fixed as hereinafter provided by the Commission.

"Immediately upon the filing of such lists with the Commission, the Commission shall consider the amount and number of the materials and animals mentioned in the lists provided for above which are to be required of Germany. In reaching a decision on this matter the Comimssion shall take into account such domestic requirements of Germany as it deems essential for the maintenance of Germany's social and economic life, the prices and dates at which similar articles can be obtained in the Allied and Associated countries as compared with those to be fixed for German articles, and the general interest of the Allied and Associated Governments that the industrial life of Germany be not so disorganised as to affect adversely the ability of Germany to perform the other acts of reparation stipulated for.

"Machinery, equipment, tools and like articles of a commercial character in actual industrial use are not, however, to be demanded of Germany unless there is no free stock of such articles respectively which is not in use and is available, and then not in excess of thirty per cent. of the quantity of such articles in use in any one establishment or undertaking."

ENTRY OF ALIENS—HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair as in legislative session lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate the entry of aliens into the United States, which will be read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it occurs to me that that bill is properly referable to the Committee on Immigration. If it deals with passport regulations it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, because that committee considered the last bill on the subject and reported it back to the Senate, and this is really a reenactment of the existing law. I am not sure whether this is the same measure, known as the passport bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that the bill begins:

That if the President shall find that the public safety requires that restrictions and prohibitions in addition to those provided otherwise than by this act should be imposed upon the entry of aliens into the United States, and shall make public proclamation thereof, it shall, until otherwise ordered by Congress, be unlawful—

And so forth.

The Chair was of the distinct impression that the bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Immigration, but it has now been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Of course, however, it is subject to a motion for a change of reference.

Mr. KING. I have no particular interest in the measure. We are all anxious that that measure, or a similar one, shall pass; but it occurred to me that if it was a reenactment of existing law, a bill which was reported from the Judiciary Committee before, it ought to go to the same committee, but that if it was dealing with the general subject of immigration, it ought to go to the Immigration Committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber. May I inquire what the message from the House is?

Mr. KING. It is the passage of a bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is H. R. 9782, and it is entitled "A bill to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am the chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, to which a joint resolution concerning that very question was referred. The joint resolution was introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Minnesota spoke to me this morning as to what should be done with the bill that was passed by the House. It is known as the passport bill, I believe.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I told the Senator from Minnesota that he had better consult the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] if the question of jurisdiction between the Foreign Relations Committee and the Judiciary Committee was to be raised. They did talk together here, and I heard their conversation, from which I inferred that the Senator from Minnesota was willing that the bill should go to the Foreign Relations Committee. The Senator from Massachusetts said that that committee had always taken jurisdiction of passport matters; it comes under the State Department; and I would move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has already been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. I thought the Senator from Utah was claiming its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. KING. I think the bill ought to go to the Judiciary Committee, for the reason that the passport bill—at least, a bill to continue its existence—was reported before by the Judiciary Committee. That committee is now considering a measure similar to this, and perhaps one that amplifies its provisions. The Immigration Committee, too, is also considering the subject, so that it would be properly referable to that committee; but in view of the statement made by the Senator I have no objection to having it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I merely want to make an observation touching this matter, in the hope that the bill will not be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee. The chairman of the Immigration Committee is not here. It appears to some of us to be a question that ought to go to the Immigration Committee. It is a question of the admission of certain aliens into the United States; and I was in hope that the matter might be held in abeyance until the chairman of that committee could be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may be permitted to say that it is subject to a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Immigration if any Senator desires to make the motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I did not know that there was any question about the jurisdiction of the Immigration Committee. While I think the question of passports would not come peculiarly under the jurisdiction of that committee, I ask unanimous consent that the reference be reconsidered, and that the matter lie upon the desk, undisposed of as to its reference, until the chairmen of those three committees can be on the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. That is entirely satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the reference will be reconsidered, and the bill will lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to ask that the bill (H. R. 9782) to regulate further the entry of aliens into the United States, which I understand is on the table, and which was in charge of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think it belongs to that committee. I have spoken to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and also to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, and they are both entirely satisfied that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I therefore ask that that reference be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the bill named by him shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The question is on that motion.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the chairman of the Committee on Immigration favors that course being taken?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; he has been spoken to to-day, and said he had no objection.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House, and I think it involves naturally a question of foreign relations.

Mr. PITTMAN. I only asked the question because the Senator from Massachusetts was not present at the time the discussion concerning the bill took place a while ago.

Mr. LODGE. I was told that the Senator from Rhode Island had been spoken to and that he was entirely satisfied to have the bill referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I myself spoke to the Senator from Minnesota, the committee of which he is chairman having a similar bill before it.

Mr. KING. I may say to the Senator that the original bill—and this is a bill to continue its existence—was reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate at the last session of Congress; but I have no objection to the bill going to the Committee on Foreign Relations

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, October 18, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 17, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, by whom we are continually upheld and sustained, control our minds, direct our ways, and make straight our paths, that our service may be of the highest and best, that we may ascend day by day to the higher manhood in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. In the opinion of the Chair no quorum is present.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "industry or otherwise," and insert "industrial pursuits including agriculture, trade, commerce, manufacturing, mining, transportation, and all the mechanic arts.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment adopted by the committee.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 148, noes 65.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The vote next comes upon the second amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARSS: On page 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "and who are without sufficient means to provide for their own rehabilitation."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 57, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit. I am a member of the committee, and I am against the bill.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I am the ranking member of the committee and I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other gentlemen who have motions to recommit?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have one.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman on the committee?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am not on the committee.

The SPEAKER. Who is the ranking member?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. SEARS; but I am against the bill and he is for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman need not proceed to qualify until asked to do so. Is the gentleman from Florida opposed to the bill?

Mr. SEARS. I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Florida, the ranking member of the committee. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SEARS moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Education with instructions to report the same back instanter with the following amendment:

On page 3, line 7, after the word "act," strike out all of lines 7 and 8 down to the semicolon and insert the following: "and the Federal board shall furnish to the State boards annually general plans and specifications or such information on vocational education as they may have."

And also, in line 8, strike out all down to and including the semicolon after "directors" in line 17.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute motion to recommit——

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Where a motion to recommit is read by the Clerk and a Member calls the attention of the Speaker to the fact that he desires to offer a substitute motion to recommit, is he not entitled to recognition?

The SPEAKER. He is not. The gentleman in charge of the bill is entitled to recognition.

The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SEARS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-six gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no question of the other side. The question is whether one-fifth of the Members present demand a quorum.

Mr. SEARS. I demand the other side, because other business has been transacted since a quorum was developed.

The SPEAKER. The only question was whether or not there were one-fifth of the Members present demanding a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask that the Chair count?

Mr. SEARS. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [During the count.] The Chair has already counted 225 Members, and there are many uncounted. A quorum is present. The motion to recommit is rejected. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 196, nays 105, answered "present" 9, not voting 120, as follows:

On motion of Mr. TOWNER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have 10 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have 10 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, would the gentleman mind making that five legislative days?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to put in newspaper clippings?

Mr. BLANTON. The only thing I intend to put in is my position on the bill, together with the motion to recommit, which, under the rules of the House, I was prohibited from commenting on.

Mr. WINGO. I will not object, provided the gentleman does not put in clippings from newspapers or letters laudatory of his political ambitions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD, to be confined strictly to the bill, their own remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have five legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on the bill just passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman from Missouri will make it three legislative days I will not object. Three is enough.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not care whether it is three or five.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. While the subject is alive, if men are anxious to get into the RECORD, let them get in. As a matter of fact, it is almost impossible to secure the paper to print the RECORD. I shall not object to three days.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will change it to three, but I will insist that the speeches that go in shall be the speeches of the men who pretend to make them, and that there shall be no exhibits in there.

Mr. WINGO. Limited to this subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; and limited to the subject.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I was not well last evening and last night, and I did not revise my remarks. I desire the privilege of revising and extending, strictly upon the bill, my remarks.

The SPEAKER. One unanimous-consent request is pending, that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] under that will have that privilege.

WILLIAM Z. FOSTER.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes, so that in that time there may be read to the House the letter of Senator POMERENE to the United Labor Congress at Youngstown, Ohio, in response to their resolutions touching Congressman COOPER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes and to have read the letter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, does the letter intend to reflect upon Congressman COOPER?

Mr. DAVEY. No. This is Senator POMERENE'S defense of Congressman COOPER.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I will have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the letter presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DAVEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 1½, 1919.

MR. HARRY DECHUND,
Secretary United Labor Congress, Youngstown, Ohio.

DEAR SIR: Your recent favor received, inclosing copy of the preamble and resolutions adopted by the United Labor Congress, Youngstown, Ohio, criticizing the speech made by Congressman JOHN G. COOPER on the 23d day of September, 1919, in the House of Representatives.

As a committee of the Senate is now investigating the steel strike, I shall refrain from making any comment thereon until the hearings are ended and the report presented. Your criticisms, however, relate to what Congressman COOPER said with regard to William Z. Foster, and lest I be misunderstood by my silence I can not pass them by.

I read Congressman COOPER'S speech the day after it was delivered; since the receipt of your resolutions I have read it again. Truth compels me to say that I indorse both in spirit and in letter everything he said respecting William Z. Foster.

[Applause.]

While I am not familiar with all the details of the steel strike, I have examined into the merits of William Z. Foster. He was an I. W. W. and a syndicalist. It is claimed for him that he has since reformed. I have read his booklet on Syndicalism, and a number of his letters printed in Solidarity. I have read his more recent book on Trade Unionism—The Road to Freedom, and I have read most of his testimony recently given before the Senate committee.

In his pamphlet on Syndicalism he advocated direct action, sabotage, revolution, and the destruction of government.

In his letters in Solidarity he urged getting into trade-unions and "boring from within" the trade-union movement; and adds: "I am satisfied from my observation that the only way for the I. W. W. to have the workers adopt and practice the principles of revolutionary unionism—which I take is its mission—is to give up the attempt to create a new labor movement, turn itself into a propaganda league, get into the organized-labor movement, and by building up better fighting machines within the old unions than those possessed by our reactionary enemies, revolutionize these unions, even as our French syndicalist fellow workers have so successfully done with theirs," and signs his letter, "Yours, for revolution, Wm. Z. Foster."

In his recent work on trade-unionism he says: "Under the new order (as he pictures the plan) government, such as we know it, would gradually disappear. In an era of science and justice this make-shift institution, having lost its usefulness, would shrivel and die." And again he says, "Criminal courts, police, jails, and the like would go also."

In his recent testimony before the Senate committee now investigating the steel strike, while it is true that he claimed to have modified his former views somewhat, it is not apparent that they have been substantially changed.

It is significant that the reds, the I. W. W.'s, and all that class of people who believe in abolishing private property are Foster's eager followers.

The President of the United States, in the interests of the whole public, begged that this strike be delayed until after there could be an investigation by the industrial conference now sitting in Washington. Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor, opposed the calling of the strike, but nevertheless it was called at the instance of Mr. Foster and other leaders of the radical element. It looks to the public as if he were making good his statement in Solidarity, "to bore from within" the trade-union movement.

Why should you decline to accept the counsel of Congressman COOPER, an American, who is imbued with the American spirit, and who by every act of his life has shown his interest in law-abiding labor, and prefer to accept the leadership of Foster, who until very recently was a self-confessed I. W. W. and syndicalist, and even now preaches the abolishment of private property and the overthrow of the courts and of government?

Permit me to suggest in a very kindly way: Do not mistake the American spirit. Americans are patient and long-suffering. If our Government needs changing, the majority will change it and not the minority; and when it is changed it will be by real Americans and not by soviets or Bolshevists of the Foster type. [Applause.] To place Foster at the head of any movement is an insult to every law-abiding laboring man, and to America herself. We do not need the aid of the Fosters and the un-Americanized foreign element to tell us how to run our country.

When Lincoln witnessed the sale of the mulatto slave girl on the auction block in New Orleans, he said if he ever had an opportunity to hit slavery he would hit it hard; and so permit me to suggest—and I think I understand the American people—if they ever have occasion to hit Bolshevism in this country, it will be hit harder than Lincoln hit slavery. [Applause.]

America would not tolerate the menace of a military autocracy in Germany. She raised an army of 4,000,000 men to prevent it. This same spirit will not sit silently by and see builded up in this country an industrial autocracy, whether it be in the name of capital or of labor. We have the best Government in the world, and we are going to keep it the best. It is like the air about us. Some people can not appreciate its life-preserving qualities until it is taken away. But most Americans understand it.

Americans—and I am one of them—sympathize with labor in their reasonable demands, but they never will approve a movement which is led by the Fosters and their kind. [Applause.] Their activities bode no good to anyone.

Very sincerely, ATLEE POMERENE.

[Applause.]

During the reading of the foregoing letter Mr. DAVEY'S time expired, and Mr. WALSH asked that the reading of the letter might be completed. His request was granted by unanimous consent.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SNELL, from the Committee on Rules, submits the following report:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House resolution 339, submitted a privileged report on the resolution, with the recommendation that it be agreed to.

House resolution 339.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 9783, being "A bill to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes." That the bill shall be the continuing order of business, except consideration of conference reports and matters on the Speaker's table. That there shall be 12 hours of general debate confined to the subject matter of the bill, to be divided equally, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. GOOD, and the other half by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS. That at the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendments under the five-minute rule. That at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendments the bill together with the amendments, if any, shall be reported to the House. That the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. The resolution reads that general debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill. Would that exclude debate on the other part of the program, the other bill, which accomplishes this which is reported by the committee, which changes the rules of the House?

Mr. SNELL. As I understand it, this is simply intended to keep out all the miscellaneous speeches that are usually made in general debate. It should be confined to the bill and things pertinent to it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think the debate should be confined to the subject matter, but as stated in the report, this is only a part of the program, or in other words, this is a camouflage leading up to something else.

Mr. SNELL. It was intended to confine the debate to the general program of legislation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Would that include item No. 2, action on the budget by Congress, as indicated on page 3 of the report?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; I understand it would.

Mr. HAUGEN. With that understanding I certainly have no objection, but that is the important thing in the whole proposition; and, as stated in the report, it is clear that this bill is simply a camouflage and the forerunner for the other proposition. With that understanding I have no objection to the adoption of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask the Chair if the adoption of this rule making this bill a continuing order is intended to dispense with Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would not dispense with Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will yield further, I would like to inquire if the time is to be equally divided between those who favor and those who are opposed to the bill? We had that assurance from the chairman and the ranking member the other day, and I suppose that will be carried out.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I wish you would order these gentlemen to talk loudly enough so that people can hear them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes they would. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important matters that ever came before this House. If anything can be done that will improve the manner of making up the national budget, or tending toward efficiency in the expenditure of Federal funds, it is the duty of this Congress to do it.

Early in the session the House, recognizing the importance of the matter, appointed a special committee to consider this legislation. This resolution simply carries out the express wishes of Congress in making the report of this committee in order at this time, and the report of the Committee on Rules is unanimous.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, just a few words, not so much upon the rule itself as upon the bill that it is proposed to make in order.

I think the House and the country are to be congratulated upon the fact that this step forward in budget legislation is about to be taken. For many years thoughtful students of our fiscal policies have realized the necessity for the budget system. The party to which I belong, as well as the other party, I think, indorsed such legislation in its national platform in 1916. An effort was made in the last Congress to carry out this provision, and there was placed upon one of the appropriation bills legislation which would at least have marked the beginning of the budget system. That failed of passage in the other body under circumstances with which we are all familiar. Of course, I suppose no one anticipated that it would be possible for this special committee to bring in a plan which would meet every requirement of every man. For my own part, I regard this merely as the beginning. I wish it could have been possible at this time—and I trust it may be possible in the future—to develop a system whereby in the House itself there will be a closer coordination than there has been heretofore or than will be possible even under this bill, if I construe it correctly, of appropriations and revenues. I hope to see the day come when every bill which is brought into the House providing for an appropriation or an authorization shall have with it in some tangible form a plan for obtaining the revenue to pay that particular appropriation; or, if the revenues are already in existence, point out from whence they are to come. [Applause.] I think that would have a very wholesome effect upon legislation. I think it would have been very fortunate, for instance, if the bill which has just passed this House could have had opposite its authorization a statement of the place from which the money is to come, the millions and millions of dollars to pay for it. And so of many matters of legislation to be brought before the House.

It was not expected of this bill that it would meet that requirement; but this bill is, in my opinion, a decided improvement over the present system.

I do not propose, of course, to attempt to go into details. That may more properly be left to those who have been intimate with it during its consideration.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SEARS. This is evidently an important bill, or a special rule would not have been brought in. I notice that the debate is limited to 12 hours, to be confined to the subject. The gentleman knows that there is not and will not be a quorum present during the debate, and I would like to ask why 12 hours of general debate are given to this subject when a quorum will not be present and when the people of the country want some action toward reducing the high cost of living and less action in disposing of hot air?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I can only say in answer to the gentleman that it was the thought of the members of the Committee on Rules, influenced largely, I will say very frankly, by the suggestions that came particularly from the members of the Special Budget Committee and other gentlemen in the House interested in this subject, that this was a matter of very great importance, proposing a profound change in our fiscal policy, and it was believed that ample time should be given for the consideration of so important and far-reaching a measure. Provision was made that it should be confined to the bill, for obvious reasons. Of course, it was understood in the Committee on Rules that there could properly come within the scope of the subject matter of this bill a discussion of another proposition which is pending and perhaps has been reported from the Budget Committee—I am not sure as to that—changing the rules of the House of Representatives. The Committee on Rules believed that that was a part of the subject matter, and it was the understanding in the Committee on Rules that that matter could be legitimately discussed under the language of this rule. That is all I can say in response to the gentleman from Florida.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] in charge of the bill has properly said, this is one of the most important pieces of legislation that will come before this Congress. As a matter of fact, I am inclined to think that with the exception of the railroad legislation, which we hope to consider a little later in this session, no more important matter will come before this Congress than this bill.

All thoughtful men have realized for many years the faulty character of our method of estimating and appropriating. For many years men in and out of Congress have urged reform in the direction of a budget system.

I am frank to say that when the committee was appointed, near the beginning of the session, I scarcely hoped that it would be possible to secure unanimous agreement upon legislation. I want to congratulate the members of that committee, I want to congratulate the House and the country, on the report they have made, and on the fact that they have reported to the House unanimously in this exceedingly important matter. There is no question about the value of a budget system adapted to our form of government, and I hope that beginning with this legislation we shall be able to work out such a system. As the bill is unanimously reported, I hope it will have a like unanimous support in the House. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9783, providing for a budget system.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

A NATIONAL BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, stupendous problems await the action of the Sixty-sixth Congress. To it is committed more important questions than ever before in times of peace engaged the attention of the Nation's law-making body. This Congress must determine the Nation's policy with regard to the railroads; the merchant marine; the control and development of our national resources; our military and naval policies; and last, but by no means least, the problem of bringing our expenditures within a normal revenue. The solution of many of these and allied problems, already too long delayed, must by the very force of circumstances be solved at the earliest practicable moment.

NECESSITY FOR BUDGET LEGISLATION.

That this Congress will enact legislation providing for a national budget is certain. Many forces are working for it. Both political parties have declared for it. Business interests of the country are demanding it. The taxpayers are looking for it as the only agency that will bring about a reasonable reduction in expenditures, to the end that at an early day burdensome taxes, which tend to cripple production and prevent an extension of our foreign trade, may be reduced. This reduction can only come by a reduction in the estimated expenditures of the Government, and this reduction can only be effected by the practice of the strictest economy in every branch of the Government service. And this reduction, in turn, can only be effected by the adoption on the part of the Government of sound business principles which practical business men in every branch of industry have found essential in the successful conduct of their business affairs. That our present methods of making estimates for the expenses of the Government and of making appropriations to meet these demands are unscientific, unbusinesslike, wasteful, and extravagant no well-informed person will deny. But no system alone, however perfect in outline or complete in its details, will bring about the needed reform. It will require the exercise of the best judgment and the practice of the strictest economy by administrator and legislator alike in the administration of the most scientific plan that human ingenuity and skill can devise to bring about the desired result.

To accomplish this it will require on the part of the executive departments an entire change of administration policies. The property acquired by the Government during the war and not needed by the Government in times of peace must be sold to the best advantage of the Treasury of the United States; heads of departments must demand greater efficiency from their employees, eliminate duplications, and bring in estimates for as small sums as possible. Congress on its part must be willing to forego for the time being the enactment of laws providing for new undertakings that will require large expenditures of money, no matter how desirable the objects may be.

The war has wrought a tremendous change in the Government's fiscal affairs. Formerly our revenues flowed into the Treasury from sources that affected but slightly the ordinary citizen. That revenue came through a system of indirect taxation that the ordinary taxpayer did not feel and that did not affect industry except to stimulate its production. Our revenue then came from tariff duties, taxes on tobacco, intoxicating liquors, and sources of that character. Revenue was coming into the Treasury more rapidly that it could be expended, and Congress gave but little attention to the consideration of measures calling for new governmental activities that called for large expenditures. For 52 fiscal years, from 1866 to 1917, inclusive, the revenues exceeded the expenditures during 41 of those years, and during only 11 years did the expenditures exceed the revenues. During these 52 years the net excess of revenues over expenditures amounted to the grand total of $2,147,686,439.46. During all of that time, according to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, only $636,554,225.07 of direct taxes were collected, and these taxes were paid by comparatively few persons. For the calendar year 1909, 52,498 corporations in the United States made tax returns showing a taxable income, while in 1917 this number had increased to 232,079. For the calendar year 1913, 357,598 persons made individual income-tax returns, and for the year 1917 this number was increased to 3,472,890. It is thus seen that the number of corporations and persons who are affected by direct taxes is rapidly increasing, and with that increase there will come an increased demand for the practice of economy and efficiency, both on the part of the executive departments and of Congress.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, our expenditures totaled $1,025,698,578.59, while for the current fiscal year it is estimated that it will require to pay current expenses and to discharge obligations created while we were at war approximately $10,830,000,000. In this connection, however, it should be remembered that a large part of the expenditures of this year are necessary to pay obligations created for war purposes, and which ought to be largely discharged before the end of this fiscal year.

In a recent statement Hon. John J. Fitzgerald, who for more than 19 years was an honored Member of this House and for more than six years the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, said that in the future the annual requirements for the support of the Government would amount to $5,000,000,000. I realize, as I am sure he does, that it is impossible to say with any degree of exactness just what our requirements will be. But it has seemed to me that someway and somehow the expenses of the Government should be so reduced that they will not exceed $4,000,000,000 per annum. But I realize that to accomplish this result will require a business administration of a high order on the part of the Executive, and the strongest possible determination on the part of Congress to economize in appropriations and to stop enacting legislation that will in the future require the expenditure of public funds. I trust the expenses of the Government will be less than the amount I have indicated. But I shall be surprised if the estimates soon to be submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury for the next fiscal year do not exceed $5,000,000,000 as the estimated requirements for that year. I realize that to do this Congress must forego the doing of some of those things which Members think ought to be done. Unquestionably the necessities of the situation must compel us to give up the doing of some things which forward-looking men, under more favorable conditions, would like to do. It will require, and ought to require, the amortization of our war debt covering a period of at least 50 years.

THE PRESENT METHOD OF SUBMITTING ESTIMATES.

To understand the changes which the proposed bill will effect one must first be familiar with the details of our present system. Under the law it is the duty of the heads of the several executive departments and independent Government establishments to furnish the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the 15th day of October of each year with an annual estimate of the funds necessary for their respective departments for insertion in the Book of Estimates. Under this law it is the practice of the head of each of such departments to designate the head of each bureau under him to make the estimate of the expenses for his bureau. When all of the estimates from the various bureau chiefs under a given department have been thus made, the head of that department submits his estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has no power to increase or diminish them, and no power to coordinate the services of the several bureaus or to prevent duplications in the service. Bureaus under different executive departments doing similar work are thus stimulated in a spirit of rivalry, and so far as the estimates that come to Congress go no one coordinates or attempts to coordinate the various activities of the several departments. In practice this system has resulted in waste, extravagance, and inefficiency, and duplications in the Government service.

The defect in this plan must be apparent to anyone who has made a study of its practical operation. Everyone familiar with the practical operation of this system agrees that its failure lies in the fact that no one person is responsible for the estimates to Congress. They are a patchwork and not a structure. As a result a great deal of the time of the committees of Congress is taken up in exploding visionary schemes of bureau chiefs, for which no administration would be willing to stand sponsor. They provide for building up rival bureaus and no one is responsible for bringing about their coordination or limiting their activities. The result is that Congress is criticized, and justly so, for its failure to provide a system which will correct these abuses. The system is wrong, and Congress alone can change the system. If it fails to act now and refuses to make the necessary changes in a plan that is admittedly bad, Congress will and should receive the condemnation of the American people.

It has been urged that the act of March 4, 1909, gives the President the power to correct this evil. Unquestionably such was the intention of Congress in enacting that legislation. But in practice it has not had that result. The act provides:

> Immediately upon the receipt of the regular annual estimates of appropriations needed for the various branches of the Government it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to estimate as nearly as may be the revenues of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year, and if the estimates for appropriation, including the estimated amount necessary to meet all continuing and permanent appropriations, shall exceed the estimated revenues the Secretary of the Treasury shall transmit the estimates to Congress as heretofore required by law and at once transmit a detailed statement of all of the said estimates to the President, to the end that he may, in giving Congress information of the state of the Union and in recommending to their consideration such measures as he may judge necessary, advise the Congress how in his judgment the estimated appropriations could with least injury to the public service be reduced so as to bring the appropriations within the estimated revenues, or, if such reduction be not in his judgment practicable without undue injury to the public service, that he may recommend to Congress such loans or new taxes as may be necessary to cover the deficiency.

It will be observed that it is only when the estimated revenues are not sufficient to meet the estimated expenditures that the President is called upon to practice this measure of economy. Even in such cases that provision of law has not been found practical. The law has been on the statute books for more than 10 years, and up to this time no President has ever availed himself of its provisions. The reason is obvious. The estimates are made up by the members of his Cabinet. To sit in review after the estimates have been submitted to Congress and to make reductions therein would in effect amount to repudiation of published statements just previously made by the respective members of his Cabinet. If the President is to perform this function he should be required to perform it in the first instance, and not simply to review what his Cabinet members have already done.

The study and review of the proposals should be made in the first instance and not after the estimates have been submitted to Congress.

A BUREAU OF THE BUDGET—THE PRESIDENT'S RESPONSIBILITY.

The bill provides for the creation of the Bureau of the Budget in the office of the President, with a director and an assistant director appointed by the President. The bureau will be provided with such assistants and employees as may be necessary to collect for the President all the information necessary to enable him to submit to Congress on the first day of each regular session the annual budget. It is proposed that the budget shall contain balanced statements of revenues and expenditures of the Government, and an itemized statement of the proposed expenditures.

The bill fixes the responsibility for the budget on the President of the United States. Broadly speaking, the change, therefore, is from a system where no person is responsible for the estimates of expenditure to one where absolute responsibility is fixed on an elective officer of the United States. If duplication, waste, extravagance, and inefficiency shall exist in the service in the future, the President will be responsible for them if he includes in his budget an estimate for their continuation. The functions that are now performed by the members of the President's Cabinet, acting separately and without any coordination, would in practice be performed by their acting as a unit in assisting the President to present a budget for which his administration is willing to stand and by which it would be judged. It substitutes teamwork in the executive departments for the unorganized individual work of each of the 10 members of the Cabinet.

Under the law "the estimates of expenses for the Government, except those for sundry civil expenses, shall be prepared and submitted each year according to the order and arrangement of the appropriation acts for the year preceding." The hearings developed the fact that there must be some change in the order of estimates, and that in order to effect real economy the President should be permitted to submit a new order of arrangement by which appropriations could be made for the functions of the Government rather than the separate departments of the Government. In order to permit the President to present such a budget it was thought necessary to give him authority, in submitting his first budget, to submit also an alternative budget, which could be prepared in such form and according to such system of classification and itemization as in his judgment would be most appropriate, and which would effect the greatest degree of economy. Hence the committee inserted in the bill a section providing for the submission of an alternative budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922. If Congress shall, in considering the budget for that year, adopt the plan submitted by the President, then the provision of law now on the statute books would apply to that budget as well as it now applies to the various items contained in the Book of Estimates.

THE BRITISH BUDGET SYSTEM.

It was the unanimous opinion of the committee that a great deal had been said and much had been written on the subject of a national budget by men who knew very little about our present system. Our present plan has been criticized from one end of the country to the other, and most of this criticism has been based on misstatements of fact. No member of the Select Committee on the Budget, or no person who sat with the committee and heard the hearings, will, I am sure, have the temerity to say that the United States has no system of finance. That our present system is faulty and needs to be greatly modified all who have studied the problem will agree; but these changes, it was agreed by the committee, should be made not by discarding the entire system, including that which was good, but rather by the retention of all that is good and by eliminating that which is bad, and the substitution of a plan that will strengthen it and make it more nearly perfect. Many of these writers and critics who have said that we have no system at all have pointed to the British system as an ideal plan for a national budget. No one familiar with the British system of government will for a moment contend that the United States could or should adopt that system. In the first place, the difference in the form of government of the two countries precludes our adopting their system if we desired to do so. In the second place, I doubt very much whether we would care to adopt the British budget system. After all, the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

The British Isles comprise about 121,000 square miles of territory—less than half the size of Texas; not as large as California, Montana, or New Mexico; about the size of Nevada, Colorado, and Arizona. Their population is approximately 45,000,000 people. We have in continental United States nearly 3,000,000 square miles of territory and over 100,000,000 of people, and yet for the fiscal year 1914 the budget for the British Isles carried approximately the same as the total appropriations for the United States, including Alaska and our insular possessions.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF CONGRESS.

Under our present system, by which appropriations are closely scanned by Congress and by its committees, are to be found advantages not contained in the exchequer and audit departments act of Great Britain of 1866. But it contains weaknesses that must be corrected; and it is the opinion of the committee that with the enactment of this bill into law and the passage of House resolution 324 our system will be superior to that of Great Britain. When the whole program as outlined in this bill and in House resolution 324, providing for the changes in the rules of the House and the substitution of one large Committee on Appropriations for eight separate committees shall have been adopted by Congress and put into effect, absolute responsibility for each step in the making of appropriations will be fixed. The President will be responsible for the creation of the budget. His responsibility will end when that budget has been transmitted to Congress, and with the ending of his responsibility that of Congress will commence. Just as the President is made responsible for the preparation and transmission of the budget, so Congress will be made responsible for the budget which it shall enact. If it is found that the President's budget contains items that will lead to extravagance, waste, duplication, and inefficiency in the service, the people of the United States will hold him responsible for his act. If, on the other hand, Congress enacts a budget providing for such waste and extravagance, Members who vote for such a budget will and should be held to strict accountability for their action. With this responsibility, therefore, for each step in budget making fixed and determined by law, it is believed that a greater degree of economy can be effected than is possible under our present system.

AN "EXECUTIVE BUDGET" NOT PROPOSED.

It will no doubt be urged by some that this bill provides for an Executive budget, and that, under our Constitution, the duty of making appropriations is a legislative and not an Executive prerogative. As already pointed out, it will be the duty of the President to initiate the budget, just as it is now the duty of the heads of the several executive departments to initiate the estimates. It will be the duty of the President to transmit the budget to Congress, just as it is now the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit a Book of Estimates to Congress. To that extent, and to that extent alone, does the bill provide for an executive budget.

The bill does not take from or add to the duties now imposed upon Congress to make the most thorough examination of the estimates found in the budget, nor does it in any way restrict or limit the power of Congress to act on the budget. If, in the opinion of Congress, the estimates contained in the President's budget are too large, it will be the duty of Congress, and it will have as much power as it now possesses, to reduce them.

The bill does not in a single particular give the Executive any greater power over the consideration of appropriations by Congress than he now has. In my opinion the plan proposed will fall far short of accomplishing its real purpose if in its operation there should be any surrender by Congress of the minutest examination into every detail of the estimates, and the bill leaves Congress free and independent to act upon the proposals contained in the budget. Unquestionably, however, the estimates found in the budget will come to Congress after a more mature deliberation by the executive departments, and the work now required by Congress and its committees in making its investigation will be materially reduced.

AN ACCOUNTING DEPARTMENT CREATED.

In 1866 the Parliament of Great Britain enacted the exchequer and audit departments act. That act is a monument to the statesmanship of William E. Gladstone. It contains essential elements not found in our system, and it is contended by many who have studied budgetary legislation in the United States that by a similar law Congress would correct the evils resulting in the waste and extravagance of public funds. Indeed, there are those who think we should go no further at all at the present time than to provide for an independent audit and control of expenditures. The British exchequer and audit departments act of 1866 converted the nominal control by Parliament into a real control, and it has withstood the strongest tests that have been brought against it during the more than 50 years that this act has been a part of their statutory law. The comptroller and auditor general of Great Britain has broad powers not only in auditing all expenditures, but in investigating such expenditures. True, the investigation is a post mortem examination, yet in practice that examination also served as a check and restraining influence in the making of the budget for the succeeding year.

The bill under consideration creates an independent establishment to be known as the accounting department. The functions of this office are similar in many respects to those of the office of the comptroller and auditor general in Great Britain. All powers and duties now imposed by law upon the Comptroller of the Treasury and the six auditors are transferred to the accounting department. At present Congress has no power or control over appropriations after they are once made. This control passes to the executive departments, and these departments practically audit their own expenditures, and the legality of expenditures by an executive department is passed upon by an official appointed, and who can be removed at any time, by the Executive. After appropriations are once made by Congress, the control over expenditure of the money appropriated passes from Congress.

Our present plan precludes serious criticism of an expenditure by an auditor or the Comptroller of the Treasury. These officials owe their appointment to the President. They can not be expected long to hold their positions if they should criticize wastefulness, extravagance, or inefficiency in any of the executive departments. This system is not only unscientific but it is impracticable. It contains no check against extravagance. No successful business man would adopt such a plan in the conduct of his business affairs.

The bill provides for a comptroller general of the United States and an assistant comptroller general of the United States, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive salaries of $10,000 and $7,500 a year, respectively. They shall hold their offices during good behavior and shall be removed only by a concurrent resolution of Congress on account of inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office, and the bill provides for the retirement of either of these officials when he shall have reached the age of 70 years. This tenure in office is necessary in order to secure competent men of high standing to fill the positions. The position is a semijudicial one and the tenure in office is made secure so long as the official performs his work in a fearless and satisfactory way.

By creating this department, Congress will have applied a practical business policy to the administration of the Government's fiscal affairs. Men will be employed as auditors who owe their positions to their training and ability and who do not secure their positions as a reward for political service. They will be fearless in their examinations, and can criticize, without fear of removal, executives who misuse appropriations or whose offices are conducted in an inefficient manner. Congress and its committees will at all times be able to consult with officials of this department regarding expenditures and from it will be able to obtain the most reliable information regarding the use to which any appropriation has been put or the efficiency of any department of the Government. This independent department will necessarily serve as a check against extravagance in the preparation of the budget. Those appointed by the President and charged with the duty of assisting him in collecting data and in preparing the budget will realize that their every act and decision will come under the close scrutiny of the accounting department. If duplications, inefficiency, waste, and extravagance exist as the result of any expenditure, the President will be held responsible therefor if he continues to ask for appropriations to continue such practices. The knowledge on the part of every executive and bureau chief that such an independent and fearless department exists, and that every act and deed they perform will come under the closest scrutiny of this department, will in itself force a much higher degree of efficiency in every department of the Government.

One of the greatest weaknesses in our present system lies in the fact that committees charged with the responsibility of considering appropriation bills have but little assistance in arriving at correct conclusions. The persons appearing before the committees of Congress in explaining estimated requirements are in the main the very bureau chiefs who prepared the estimates. Proud of their achievement and jealous of their power they appear before these committees to exploit the attainments of their respective bureaus, to cover up the shortcomings of their departments, and to minimize waste and inefficiency, no matter how great the extravagance may be. They magnify their accomplishments and either conceal or forget their shortcomings. They pad their estimates and stultify themselves in attempting to maintain them. Not infrequently do they fool Congress and its committees by securing larger appropriations than they know is necessary, but when these appropriations are once secured, in order to prevent a reduction in them in succeeding years, they proceed to spend the appropriation for things not contemplated when the grant was made. The result is an ex parte examination by Congress, and in this examination, even though made most searching and thorough, Congress too frequently hears only half the truth and sometimes gets an altogether erroneous conception of the real situation.

Even the heads of the executive departments, as a rule, are not informed as to the actual conditions of the separate bureaus under them. This fact has been clearly demonstrated by the appearance of Cabinet members before appropriation committees. Members of the Cabinet have too frequently demonstrated before such committees that they have no detailed information with regard to the departments they are administering. Indeed, so great has been the humiliation of members of the Cabinet in this regard that the practice which formerly obtained of members of the Cabinet appearing before appropriation committees in support of their estimates has practically passed into disuse.

The office of comptroller general will be a very important and powerful one. In some respects it may be compared to the office of the British comptroller and auditor general. How important that office was during the war and how it functioned when the British treasury, and even the House of Commons, failed to function is best told in the speech of the Hon. Leif Jones, made in the House of Commons on October 24, 1916. He said:

The honorable member for Huddersfield [Mr. Sherwell] has brought the House back to a consideration of the real subject matter of to-day's debate. It is a misfortune that in discussing the report of the public accounts committee the whole time should have been taken up with the grievances of one or two firms who happen to have come under the notice of the committee through the evidence given to it by the administrative department which had dealings with those firms. The work of the public accounts committee—I say this not from any prejudice in its favor, because I have sat upon it for 10 years—is of the utmost importance in the financial structure of this country. It is important in peace time, but I venture to say that it is tenfold as important now that a great war is being waged. The ordinary control of this House over finance has wholly disappeared during the war. We have no estimates. We have the estimates for the civil service, but there are no estimates for the war office or navy expenditure. The House of Commons has not the control which it exercises ordinarily through considering the estimates. Treasury control has largely disappeared. Both the great spending departments which deal with the war urge that the ordinary control of the treasury could not be exercised during the war because of the need for haste. The chairman of the public accounts committee pointed that out in his opening speech. He pointed out that the war has necessitated a great expenditure without any time to consider that expenditure. The result is that the treasury is not able to consider the expenditure before the departments, the war office, and the Admiralty make it. The only control which is left is control after the event, and it is most important, late as it comes, that that control after the event should be as thorough as possible and that there should be full investigation into those matters to which the comptroller and auditor general draws attention in his report upon the appropriation account. Although we are glad even to get the appropriation account in its present form, not in the form in which we shall have it after the war, the appropriation account and in the account of the comptroller and auditor general to enable the public accounts committee, which deals with that report, to know how the money of the nation has been spent and whether the methods which have been pointed out be bad are still bad—whether there has been improvement as the war goes on.

The honorable member for Galway has reminded the house of the great functions of the comptroller and auditor general, who, indeed, is the real guardian, on behalf of the House of Commons, of the purse of the nation. He is a great officer of state. He is not removable even by the Government of the day. He can only be removed on a petition from both Houses of Parliament. He is appointed expressly by this house to safeguard the expenditures of the country and to see that the accounts are properly audited and properly appropriated for the purpose for which this house intended. There is no power in the house nor in the prime minister nor in the cabinet to override the decisions of the comptroller and auditor general. He is one of the great officials in this country. He presents his report annually to the house. They are considered by the public accounts committee, and it is not only our right, it is bounden duty where the comptroller and auditor general has pointed out matters in connection with expenditure which to him do not seem quite right, or which require further investigation; it is, I say, our bounden duty to call attention to these matters in our report, so that the house may consider them.

If the comptroller and auditor general of the British House of Commons is the "real guardian, on behalf of the House of Commons, of the purse of the nation," the comptroller general provided for under this bill will become the real guardian of the Treasury of the United States. He will become one of the most powerful and useful Government officials, and, in my opinion, more real economy and efficiency will result through the creation of this office than any other single step we could possibly take.

The creation of an independent auditing department will produce a wonderful change. The officers and employees of this department will at all times be going into the separate departments in the examination of their accounts. They will discover the very facts that Congress ought to be in possession of and can fearlessly and without fear of removal present these facts to Congress and its committees. The independent audit will, therefore, I believe, accomplish a threefold result:

First. It will serve to inform Congress at all times as to the actual conditions surrounding the expenditure of public funds in every department of the Government;

Second. It will serve as a check on the President and those under him in the preparation of his budget;

Third. It will require every Cabinet member to make a study of his department, to the extent that he will become master of the work of the various bureaus under him. He will be made to realize what he has not realized in the past, that he will be responsible for the waste and extravagant use of public funds appropriated for the use of his department.

CONCLUSION.

I have referred to House resolution 324, which provides for a change in the rules of the House. That resolution takes from the Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and the Committee on Indian Affairs their present jurisdiction to report appropriation bills. It confers upon one committee of 35 members full authority to report all appropriation bills. I refer to the resolution at this time only to advise the House that it is not the intention to call that resolution up for consideration until the next session of Congress, and probably not until this bill has been enacted into law. It was the unanimous judgment of the committee that the bill we are considering to-day should be enacted into law. There is, however, some difference of sentiment in the committee regarding the advisability of passing House resolution 324, and when that resolution is considered, full and complete opportunity will be given the Members of the House to discuss it. I refer to it now in passing only to disarm criticism that would otherwise be made of the Select Committee on the Budget, if in reporting out this bill it failed to refer in some way to needed changes in the rules of the House.

The proposed legislation is of vital importance to the people of the United States. No legislation of greater import will engage the attention of this Congress. More than three years ago the political parties promised it. To-day the people are earnestly demanding it. In proposing this legislation we lay no claim that it is perfect. Time alone will develop its imperfections, and when they appear Congress should not hesitate to correct them. In my opinion this legislation is solidly founded upon sound business principles, and its adoption will mark the beginning of a new era in the financial history of the United States. Once enacted, this legislation will need no defender. The saving it will effect will speak more loudly than words can tell of its real worth. As Burke put the old Latin law, it will "give us a system of economy, which is itself a great revenue." [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TILSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 230) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare and issue a supplementary report on the condition of the cotton crop.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 12) authorizing the Clerk of the House of Representatives in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 8624) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917, and to regulate rents in the District of Columbia," to make certain designated corrections.

NATIONAL BUDGET SYSTEM.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized for six hours.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, several gentlemen have stated that the pending bill is one of the most important pieces of legislation that will come before Congress at this session. That statement, in my judgment, is entirely true. In view of the tremendous and enormous expenditures of our Government, which will continue for years to come, and the great amount of revenue that will have to be raised in order to meet those expenditures, I know of nothing more important than legislation which has for its purpose the improvement of the method of submitting estimates and making appropriations by Congress in the interest of economy and better efficiency in the Government service.

The chairman of the Special Committee on the Budget, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], has prepared and filed a report on this bill which very ably and comprehensively sets forth the reasons and the necessity for the adoption of some legislation of this kind and gives full explanation of the various provisions of the bill. I hope that all of the Members, if they have not already done so, will take occasion to read that report before the bill comes up for a final vote.

THE OBJECT OF THE BUDGET.

The Special Committee on the Budget has presented the pending bill for the consideration of the House with the very earnest conviction that, if enacted into law, it will not only result in a more orderly and businesslike method of making the appropriations necessary to run the Government, but that it will also bring about much greater economy and efficiency in the service. For a number of years many contributors to magazines and other periodicals and students of the budget system and its results in those countries where it has been established have strongly advocated the adoption by Congress of some sort of a budget system for our Government. True, many of them have differed widely as to just what kind of a budget system is needed. Some of them, it must be said, have written learnedly on the general subject, but have shown an amazing ignorance concerning our form of government and the principles of a budget system applicable thereto. They have extolled the British system as an ideal one and as one which could most profitably be applied in our Government, being either ignorant or forgetful of the fact that the two Governments are widely different in form, and that a successful budget system in one country could not possibly be applied to the other. In passing, it may be said that there is now going on in Great Britain a very severe criticism of its system, it being claimed that it not only deprives the people's representatives of a voice in the fiscal policy of the nation, but that it led to serious waste and extravagance in the late war. Other advocates have proceeded on the erroneous idea that a budget is needed to control and curb extravagance on the part of Congress rather than the executive branch of the Government. There are some who have written magazine articles and even books with this idea in mind, without even understanding the fundamentals of what they are writing about.

They were written in blissful ignorance of the fact that the House of Representatives, as the records will show, has always been the retrenching arm of the Government, for even the Senate seldom loses an opportunity to increase the amounts carried in the appropriation bills when they have passed the House. I do not mean to say that the House has not frequently been extravagant and perhaps wasteful of the people's money. But I lay it down as a fact that in the many appropriation bills which have been passed in the last 20 years there has not been over one or two in which the House did not greatly reduce the requests and estimates for appropriation which were submitted to Congress by the various departments of the Government—in many cases by many millions of dollars. And this is true of both Republican and Democratic administrations.

But, Mr. Chairman, regardless of this, there is undoubtedly much room for reform in the legislative as well as the executive branch of the Government. For some time, and largely as a result of my service on the Appropriations Committee, I have been very firmly of the opinion that in order to bring about greater economy and efficiency in the Government there ought to be a change in the present method of formulating estimates and submitting them to Congress, and perhaps in the manner in which they are considered by Congress, and certainly as to the control of the expenditures of our Government. As the expenditures of our Government have continued to increase year by year, it has become more and more apparent that in the interest of economy and efficiency there should be established some sort of a budget system. A budget may be described in general terms as a plan or proposal showing the estimated revenues and also the proposed expenditures of the Government during the ensuing fiscal year, or as it was defined in the hearings before the committee, "a budget is a prospectus of Government business for the year." As stated, it involves a statement of the Government income with the method by which the proposed additions to income are to be secured, and also the estimate of what it will take to run the Government as the law provides it shall be run, and such new services as the proposers may deem essential for the coming year.

I have said that the adoption of a budget has been advocated for a number of years. Among the most prominent advocates of such a system were former President Taft, both during and since his administration; Hon. John J. Fitzgerald and Hon. Swagar Sherley, both of whom were great chairmen of the Appropriations Committee; and President Wilson in his message to Congress on December 4, 1917. The necessity for some sort of a budget system was recognized to be of such great importance that both of the great political parties declared for it in 1916 in their national party platforms. Even then, however, although ably advocated by a number in both political parties and both in and out of Congress, there was no general public demand or public sentiment in favor of the inauguration of such a system. No action was taken by Congress until the last session, when the House unanimously adopted a provision on an appropriation bill providing for the appointment of a committee to prepare budgetary legislation, but it did not become effective on account of the failure of the appropriation bill to pass the Senate. Some one has said that the Government, like the individual, is a creature of habit. This is entirely true. It is prone to follow along the old beaten path until strong pressure causes it to move to higher ground. And so long as our revenues exceeded our expenditures, and so long as it was possible to collect the necessary revenues by way of indirect taxation and the taxpayer paid his tax without knowing he was paying it, there was no general demand or particular desire on the part of the general public for economy or a reform in our financial and accounting system.

In order that there may be real and practical economy, it is essential that there shall be a public demand for it. The Government at Washington reflects the views, wishes, and sentiments of the people as their Representatives understand them; and if the people are indifferent to extravagance and unconcerned as to the amount of public expenditures, there is but little real resistance to the persistent and constant demand which is ever pressing on Congress for enlarged and new and untried Federal activities. As a result, the National Government is now performing many functions of government which really belong to the States and municipalities and could best and more economically be performed by them. The people are now watching the Government expenditures closer than ever, and as a result there has happily come a persistent demand for budgetary reform in the interest of economy and efficiency in Government service. The reason for this change is perfectly obvious. Experience has shown that after every war the people—at least for a time—have given a closer scrutiny to their Government's expenditures. There has always been a huge war debt to pay, and the people are brought face to face with higher taxes. These conditions have been multiplied many times by the last war, and the people are turning their eyes on Washington in order to see just how their money is being spent. It is this fact which makes it possible to do now what could not be done a few years ago—that is, to secure the favorable consideration of a measure revising our appropriating and accounting system in the interest of economy and efficiency.

The annual expenses of our Government are now many times greater than they were a few years ago, and they must continue so for many years to come, on account of the obligations incurred as a result of the war. They are now so large that only a very small part of the necessary revenue can be collected by way of indirect taxation. The great bulk of taxes collected for our National Government must come directly from the pockets of the people. Before the war our public debt was less than $1,000,000,000. To-day it has reached the stupendous figure of over $26,000,000,000, the annual interest on which alone amounts to more than the entire annual cost of our Government a few years ago. The Secretary of the Treasury has stated that, in his opinion, the deficit during the fiscal year will amount to $1,000,000,000, and that this will be taken care of by the last installments of the Victory loan. But he has uttered a solemn warning that if Congress does not practice economy, or if legislation is enacted creating large additional charges on the Treasury, another bond issue will be necessary, thereby not only adding to the burden of future generations but also the present generation by way of increased interest charges and the burden caused by a further inflation of public credit. Those who are urging some of the bills pending before Congress should very seriously ponder this solemn warning of the head of the Treasury. Business, agriculture, labor, industry of all kinds must contribute each year its share to the $4,000,000,000, and perhaps more, that will likely be needed to run the Government for some years to come on the most economical basis possible. These taxes will fall hardest on the man of moderate or small means, who constitutes by far the greater proportion of our solid citizenship. Everyone must recognize, therefore, the urgent need of the strictest economy in governmental affairs, and that public expenditures must be reduced to the lowest possible minimum consistent with efficient and proper service.

While it is perfectly manifest that a reform in our fiscal policy as it relates to expenditures is greatly needed, it is not within the facts to say, as some have said, that we have no laws on the subject and that the present system is entirely slipshod and haphazard. Present law directs the heads of the departments to submit their estimates of appropriations needed for their departments during the ensuing fiscal year to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury is required to submit a statement showing the estimated revenues for the next fiscal year, along with the estimated total expenditures for that year, which are the fundamentals of any and all budget systems. Under the law passed March 4, 1909, the President, whenever the estimated expenditures exceed the estimated revenues, is directed to recommend to Congress a plan either for reducing the expenditures or for raising the additional revenue to meet the anticipated deficit. It is, however, an evidence of a defect or weakness in our system when it can be said that, with only one or two shining exceptions, no head of a department shows the slightest effort to revise or prune down the estimates for his department, but accepts and transmits them just as they are handed to him by the various bureau chiefs. The inevitable result is that the estimates are invariably extravagant, for every bureau chief is interested in boosting his own bureau. He honestly believes that it is a most important part of the Government and that the interest of the Government and the people can best be served by magnifying it. This is natural and commendable, for a man is not worth his salt if he does not believe with all his heart in what he is doing. Undoubtedly the executive heads of the departments now have the power to revise and reduce these estimates, and certainly the Executive has; but the instances are rare when it has been done. It should be said, however, in all fairness, that Congress has never provided the machinery or proper agency through which it could effectually be done. That is what we propose to do by this bill, and thus fix the responsibility in a direct and positive way on the Executive, so that in the future if extravagant estimates are submitted the taxpayers may know just who is responsible therefor.

The bill provides that the President may appoint a director of a budget bureau. He is to be directly under the President, and is to be paid a good salary, so that a man of expert knowledge and skill may be secured. This man, with his assistant and a trained force under him, will study the various services of the Government and be able to advise the President as to their functions, with suggestions as to what, if any, reductions can be made. We all know that one of the great sources of extravagance in our Government is duplication of service. This has grown up not as a result of intent on the part of officials, but rather as a result of different interpretations of various laws. Many examples might be given, but I shall mention only two or three by way of illustration. For instance, there are chemistry bureaus in several departments, each functioning separately and with their respective overhead charges; services are being performed in the Departments of Interior and Labor similar in some respects to those being rendered by the Bureau of Public Health, which is under the Department of the Treasury. There is a clear duplication in the work being performed by the commercial attachés and agents under the Department of Commerce and the foreign-trade advisers and agents under the State Department. Under the present system of each department submitting its own estimates through the Secretary of the Treasury, without power on his part to revise them, there is no way whereby these duplications can be cut out, for each department head is anxious to maintain his own service. Congress is unable to consolidate them intelligently and without danger of doing injury to the service, because it lacks accurate information as to just how far these services duplicate or overlap each other, and it is difficult to get this information from a department which is interested in holding on to what it has. But under this bill all of these estimates will go to the President for transmission to Congress, with full power on his part to revise them, and, with the assistance of the expert force provided, he will be expected to cut out duplications, coordinating and combining different services doing the same thing under one department, thus saving overhead and also resulting in better efficiency. There were those who felt that this duty should be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, for reasons which it is not necessary to state here, but the great majority felt that it should be more properly lodged with the President, who is elected by the people and, therefore, accountable to them, and who is also the supreme head of the Government, with power over all the departments.

By far the chief advantage to be gained by this bill, Mr. Chairman, lies in the fact that it fixes in the most direct and positive way upon the President the responsibility for all the estimates submitted. If they are extravagant, then the people will know who is responsible therefor. If he wishes to exercise economy, then he is given the means whereby he may carry this view into effect. And if, while exercising economy in the submission of the estimates, Congress should prove extravagant and increase them, then an issue is made and the people will know how to judge between them. You can neither have or expect good government, Mr. Chairman, unless there is some one at the head upon whom rests the weight of responsibility. A system which relieves officials of responsibility for their acts inevitably makes for looseness, extravagance, and inefficiency in government. So I repeat the chief merit of this bill is that it fixes responsibility and brings the full light of public opinion to bear on those responsible, and in that way it will surely bring about a greater economy and efficiency in government.

The second step in the process of a budget is its consideration by the legislative body and final enactment into law. Any change in the present method of consideration by Congress will, of course, have to come by way of a change in the rules of the two Houses, and is, therefore, not attempted in the pending bill. A majority of the committee has recommended a change in the rules of the House so as to provide that all the estimates for every department shall be submitted to a single appropriation committee, with an enlarged personnel, so as to enable it to properly perform the work incident to the hearings and the preparation and passage of all the supply bills through the House. This plan, it is contended, is a wise one and necessary to full economy and the coordination of the various services of the Government. And I may say to my Democratic friends that it was made a part of the Democratic national platform of 1916 and was advocated by President Wilson in his annual message of December 4, 1917. I am perfectly well aware of the difficulty, if not impossibility, of making a change of this kind. I am frank to say that if the pending bill is adopted I do not believe this will be of such great importance as is claimed by some of its advocates. I believe that the adoption of the pending bill will do away with some of the reasons advanced in favor of one committee.

In this connection I wish to refer very briefly to a change which quite a few have advocated, influenced in some cases, I have fancied, by an undue admiration of everything that is British. And that is the insistence that a Member of Congress should be restricted in his right to offer an amendment to increase an appropriation over the estimates. Some urge that a Member should be denied this right altogether, while others advocate a two-thirds or three-fourths vote to adopt an amendment. In Great Britain the right to move to increase has been denied to members of Parliament for over 200 years, and the right to move to decrease is never resorted to. But, as I have heretofore pointed out, their system of government is different from ours. Under their method of procedure a failure to accept the estimates as submitted by the ministry is regarded as a vote of lack of confidence, and the ministry immediately resigns and goes to the country, and an issue is thus made, and sharply made at once, before the people. But not so under our form of government. When the President's estimates are rejected, there can be no immediate issue before the people. None can be made until his term of office has expired and a new President is to be chosen. I am opposed to any such restriction on a Member of Congress. It is contrary to the theory of our Government, under which all power is vested in the people. There is no greater power in government than that which controls the purse strings. It was for this power that the people of England fought for so many years, and when they finally succeeded in wresting it from the King he became a mere figurehead. Real government was vested in the people's ministers and in the Parliament, of which they are a part and to which they are responsible. I do not believe in clothing the President with the power to absolutely control the Nation's purse strings to the exclusion of a majority of the direct representatives of the people. It would be giving to him a power which it was never contemplated that he should have, and, to my mind, would be a clear departure from all the principles which underlie a republican form of government.

What may be called the third step in the consummation of an effective budget system is the audit and control of the expenditures of the Government. I think it will be admitted that the control of expenditures should properly be vested in the fund-granting rather than the fund-spending department. No private business of any magnitude would permit its executive officers, who are charged with the duty of handling its finances, to audit their own accounts. And yet that is exactly the course pursued in our Government under the present system. Congress makes the appropriations necessary to run the Government and the executive departments spend the sums appropriated and their accounts are audited by an auditor for each department and over whom Congress has not the slightest control or jurisdiction. The result is that Congress has no control over expenditures. It can not have complete control of expenditures without some system whereby the expenditures may be subjected to an examination by independent officers for the purpose of seeing whether or not the wishes of Congress in making the appropriations and any conditions imposed in making the grants were carried out in good faith. Congress repeatedly throws safeguards around appropriations and imposes checks, more or less cumbrous, but it must be conceded that this does not give the real effective control to which I am alluding. This can only be secured by ascertaining through its own independent officers just how the money has been spent. Otherwise, conditions may be solemnly imposed only to be lightly disregarded.

The pending bill seeks to prevent this by making provision, as far as can be done under our Constitution, for an officer responsible only to Congress, whose duty it shall be to audit and pass upon the legality of all Government expenditures. This is the practice followed by every other great nation in the world. This officer, who is to be known as comptroller general, and his assistant must, under the Constitution, be appointed by the President, and it is provided that they shall be confirmed by the Senate. Their term of office is indefinite, subject to involuntary retirement at the age of 70 years and to removal only by a majority of both Houses of Congress when found to be inefficient or guilty of neglect of duty or of malfeasance in office. They will thus not be subject to changing political administrations, but good and faithful service will be the test which will be applied to determine whether or not they shall be retained in office. The offices of the various auditors are transferred to this accounting department and reports as to expenditures will be made direct to Congress and such investigations made and information furnished as may be required by Congress and its committees relative to the use to which money already appropriated has been applied and the necessity of the appropriations which are being asked for the future. For, let me say just here, it is not intended by the enactment of this proposed law that the Appropriations Committee of Congress shall no longer hold careful hearings in order to determine whether or not the estimates submitted shall be allowed. It is intended to make the President responsible for the estimates which are transmitted to Congress. There his responsibility ends. Congress will be responsible for the action taken on the estimates, whether it be to increase or reduce them. And in order that it may properly meet this responsibility its committees should continue to give the closest scrutiny to every item of appropriation which is requested.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that it will not be contended by any member of the Special Budget Committee that the bill proposed is perfect in all of its details. Perfection can come only by the process of evolution. It is expected that it will be improved by amendment in the future in such manner as experience may demonstrate to be wise and proper. It is, however, confidently offered as a great improvement over the present system and in the earnest belief that, if enacted, it will bring about greater economy and better efficiency in the Government service. As has been well said, its adoption will not require the surrender of power by either branch of the Government, but it will enable both the executive and legislative branches to understand each other and the public to understand both. New Federal activities, the constant demand for the creation of others, and the enormous expenses made necessary by the war make the importance of a budget far greater to-day than ever before. Our expenses to-day are far greater than our revenues, and the people demand that the most rigid economy shall be practiced. A budget system makes it possible to closely consider and study both the revenues and expenditures of the Government at one and the same time, and in this way only can we hope to bring about that economy which the people demand and have the right to expect of their public servants. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the proposed system contained in this bill, take, for illustration, one of the departments, say, the Treasury Department. It has been the observation of a great many of us who have been to these departments that there are a number of employees sitting around in the corridors and in the offices who do not seem to be at work, who do not seem to be actually necessary, so far as numbers are concerned. Assuming the argument is true which the gentleman made awhile ago, that it is perfectly natural for the head of a bureau or a department to enlarge the activities of his department and to continue to recommend this number of employees, if, as a matter of fact, they are not, from the standpoint of strict business, necessary, how would a decision of that sort be reached under the proposed bill cutting off any number of employees who were not absolutely essential to the proper conduct of the bureau?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the statement of the gentleman, as applying to one or two departments, is one that applies to nearly all departments.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I use the Treasury Department merely as an illustration.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the adoption of this bill or the plan proposed under the bill would very effectively dispose of that very matter, and that was one of the reasons that influenced a great majority of the committee in placing this power to revise the estimates under the President. In other words, this bill provides for a budget bureau, at whose head shall be a director and an assistant, to be appointed by the President and to be under his direct jurisdiction and control. It is to be expected that the director of the bureau and his assistant, together with the trained force they will have, will throughout the year make close inspections of the various departments, not only as to the functions of each particular service and bureau in the department but also as to the necessity for the appropriations which have been made and under which they act, in order to arrive at just what suggestion they may make to the President when he is called upon to revise the estimates for future appropriations. These estimates will come from the head of the departments.

They will be sent to the President and it will be the duty of the President to send them to the Congress. He is provided with a bureau, some of whose employees will be paid good salaries in order that he may get the most expert advice. It is to be expected that he will call upon his director of the budget bureau for information as to the various services in an effort to secure economy and reduce estimates, and these persons, who are employed throughout the year, who have been making their investigations throughout the various departments, will be able to advise the President as to whether or not reductions can be made. In addition to that it will have this other very wholesome effect: If the head of a department, and particularly the head of a bureau, knows that his chief, the President of the United States, is anxious to relieve the people of as much expense as possible and that he has officials who are making these investigations day by day, week by week, and month by month, he will be more careful to see that expenses are cut down before they reach his chief for proper revision.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Will the accounting department have anything to do with this? Will they look into the efficiency of the employees of the various bureaus?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They will indirectly and very effectively, I think. Of course, it would be highly improper, I take it we will all agree, for the accounting department to be given authority to interfere with the administrative features of the various departments, but the accounting department will audit all of their expenditures. The comptroller general will pass on the question of whether or not the departments have made their expenditures in accordance with the law. He or his department will also be looking into the departments for the purpose under this law of making suggestions to Congress and its committees in the formulation and preparation of the various appropriation bills.

Mr. TILSON. In other words, it is the gentleman's idea to have the accounting department report to Congress and to be in a way under the control of Congress, whereas the budget department would be entirely under the President.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Under the control of the President.

Mr. TILSON. And it will be supposed to be in harmony with the President and with the various departments of Government under the President.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; at least in harmony with the President and his policies, because the gentleman knows that every appropriation to a certain extent carries with it a question of policy, and it would be eminently unwise, it seems to me, to place under the President some man who is not strictly in sympathy with him in order to give him advice as to just what he should do with reference to the estimates that are transmitted to Congress. The director of the budget, therefore, is to be appointed by the President without the necessity of confirmation by the Senate. When it comes to the accounting officer, who is directly responsible to Congress, he is appointed by the President, it is true, and confirmed by the Senate, but removable only by concurrent resolution of both Houses of Congress. In addition to what the gentleman has said, this bill makes the accounting officer subject not only to the Congress but to all of its committees, and at any time that any committee having under consideration an appropriation or any matter involving revenue or expenditure in any way desires information, that committee can call for the comptroller general, or for some one of his assistants, and, if necessary or thought desirable, send him down to the departments for the purpose of securing the information they wish.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] asked if this budget committee would have any supervision over the expenditures in the different departments. Hardly an appropriation bill is submitted or an estimate from the departments that does not involve increased expenditure because of increased personnel in the departments.

Before this budget is made up and sent to the Congress it will necessarily involve an examination in the departments to determine if the force in the departments is sufficient, and in that way in the first instance all these expenses will be visèed to determine whether the increased expenses are necessary for the administration of the work of the departments?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is clearly correct.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to inquire under what theory the committee acted when they provided that the budget officers should not be confirmed by the Senate but simply appointed by the President?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, that applies only to the director and assistant director of the budget. The bill specially provides that the employees necessarily employed in the work on the budget, with the exception of those two officials, shall be taken from the civil service. Now, the theory upon which the committee acted was this. As I said a moment ago every appropriation to a certain extent involves some matter of policy, either large or small. Now, this bill undertakes to make the President responsible for the transmission of these estimates. It undertakes to fix upon him the responsibility for the size of the estimate and the various requests submitted for appropriations. Now, it was thought that it would be manifestly unwise and unfair to fix this responsibility upon the President and then not to give him a free hand in the appointment of the director and the assistant, in whom he should have absolute and unquestioned confidence. They should be thoroughly in sympathy with him and his policies, because the gentleman can readily understand that if you were to provide for a director of the budget and give him a term of, say, six years you might have one administration go out and a change from one party to the other in the next administration, and it would be unfair to the incoming President to fix the responsibility upon him and at the same time give him an assistant to help carry out that responsibility appointed by his predecessor, and possibly not in sympathy with his announced policies.

Mr. DENISON. Of course that would not be the best policy, but I was wondering why these important officers should not at least pass the scrutiny of some one else except the President. Otherwise I should think they would be of no value to the President at all They will do exactly as he suggests to them to do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is to be expected, but if the President himself is not anxious to practice economy neither Congress nor the country can expect any great results from his action with respect to these estimates, but I assume that every President is anxious to bring about economy, and certainly from now on they will be extremely anxious to do so, and I assume, having the right to select two experts to give him advice and who will be close to him and in whom he will put the greatest kind of confidence, he will select men not only above reproach but in whom he can put that sort of trust. Now, if you undertake to give the Senate the right of confirmation, why it would have the power to hamper the President. We are, as I said, trying to put this responsibility directly upon the President and make him responsible and to leave no loophole whereby anyone can escape from that responsibility. I can imagine a case where a President might appoint someone as his director of budget and possibly an indifferent or perhaps a hostile Senate might hold the appointment up. So it seemed to the committee, with respect to these two men, who are to be his close confidential advisors, that he ought to have a free rein in making these appointments. Now, the gentleman understands it is a different policy we pursue in reference to the Comptroller General.

Mr. DENISON. I understand that. Of course, the gentleman understands there is a very wide sentiment in this country against any personal employees of that kind or personal officers of that kind——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. DENISON. I think there is opposition throughout the country.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I am in entire sympathy with the suggestion made by the gentleman, but I think with respect to those two officers it is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. TILSON. So, in order to have the President made responsible for this as nearly as possible, you give him officials related in a very special degree close to him. In other words, this gives him another hand or another arm which enables him to do work which he can not by reason of his present limitations perform alone.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely. And these men will proceed to do that which he would do if he had the time and opportunity.

Mr. TILSON. I understand that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman what provision has been made for giving the House the benefit of any hearing that may be conducted. Under the present system we have hearings before the committee which are available for the membership of the House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman I do not know just how many were printed. The chairman of the committee, I am sure, provided——

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am not talking about that; I am talking about after the bill is passed. Under the present system the Appropriations Committee conducts extensive hearings, and the House is enabled to vote very intelligently on any specific item. If a Member desires to do so, he can go and look up the evidence in reference to any particular item of appropriation. Now, I have read the bill very hastily, and it says the President may furnish data and information if he sees fit to do so. Suppose he does not see fit to do so? What information will the House have to vote intelligently on any proposition that may be presented?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill requires him to do so in so far as we can require the President to do anything.

But this bill has nothing to do with the consideration of estimates after they reach Congress, by its committees or by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand; but if the President is going to be made responsible, and if in the language on page 3 he will submit this data, it seems to me you are getting the question of appropriations far removed from the Representatives.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman understands, of course, that the President is made responsible only for the transmission of the estimates to Congress. They now come through the Secretary of the Treasury, and really nobody is responsible, because nobody has the power to revise them except the head of each department. Now, such data as the President may send in support of the estimates submitted will, of course, be sent to the Speaker of the House and will be published as a public document, no doubt, or perhaps in a book of estimates, as they are now published.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand that is true, but at the present time the Appropriations Committee has this responsibility, rather than the President, and the Appropriations Committee is practically required by the House to conduct these hearings and get the information that we need. Now, you are taking it out of the hands of the House practically—that is, you will not take your appropriations out of the hands of the House, but you are letting the President secure all the data and information, and, as I gather from the reading of the bill, there is no provision for the conduct of hearings. I am asking the gentleman for information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand. This bill only does two things. It does not undertake to deal with the estimates after they come to Congress and their consideration by Congress. That matter would involve, of course, a change in the House rules, and it could not be done in the form of law, and therefore would come up under a separate resolution.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Was it contemplated by the committee that hearings would be held and would reach the House?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I did not gather that from the bill, and that is the reason that I asked for information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This does not make any change in respect to that. The gentleman, of course, knows that under the present system each department chief sends his estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury by October 15, and he is required to arrange and classify them and send them to the Speaker of the House by the first day of the session.

Mr. JONES of Texas. As I understand the gentleman, it is not to interfere in any way with the full investigation by the House through its committees with any items that make up the budget?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not at all. And I should be much opposed to Congress denuding itself of that power.

Mr. CRISP. This makes it obligatory on the President to send the estimates instead of the departments, and when the estimates are here it is in the power of Congress to have hearings and to say whether the amount should be appropriated or not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is right.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I find in this large volume here, containing the report of the hearings, that Secretary Glass and other gentlemen seem to assume that, apart from any disposition that is made of this, lies the disposition by the House of Representatives and Senate. I understand this bill deals exclusively with the action of the Executive in the beginning and in the end. It does not deal at all, as the gentleman said a moment ago, with the action of Congress, because that would require a change in the rules. As I understand, House resolution No. 324 proposes to change the rules. This is the question I wanted to ask for information: Will my friend explain a little further why the consideration of that resolution is to be postponed quite indefinitely, as I understood from the chairman of the committee, if it be true it is considered important in the estimation of many of the people who testified, primarily important, with the method of disposing of the budget when it comes in from the Executive by Congress, why should there be such an indefinite postponement of House resolution 324?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sorry I can not advise the gentleman as to the reasons why the chairman proposes to postpone consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. My friend will understand I am not criticizing. I am looking for information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand, but I can only explain to the gentleman that, not being the author of the resolution, I do not know just why its more earnest advocates desire to postpone its consideration. I do not mean to say by that that I shall not vote for the resolution when it comes before the House. I rather think I shall vote for it. I take it, I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, that one reason that probably influenced those in control of it to suggest that it would be postponed was the fact that it is expected that it will have pretty hard sledding when it comes before the House, whereas the pending bill, it is thought, will receive practically unanimous approval.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me ask the gentleman if this thought did not come before the committee, that both the Senate and the House will be very busy from now on until we hope the session will adjourn, some time in the very near future, and we may have a little bit of vacation before we meet on the first Monday in December? And another reason, if this bill is not passed and does not become a law there will be no use of considering that resolution. And we thought this ought to become a law, and then they could go on and not take the other matter up until December.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I may say that, barring the question of a vacation, I had supposed if the bill should be passed it would be a logical thing to follow it at once with this resolution, which proposes the change in the rules, so as to have the reform complete, if reform is to be made, before you can start considering next year's appropriations, or perhaps the appropriations for the year following.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is an alternative budget here that takes care of this.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. On page 7 you provide for the appointment of the comptroller general of the United States and assistant comptroller general, who shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. Now, further down in the same paragraph you provide for the terms under which the comptroller general and the assistant comptroller general may be removed. It says:

> The comptroller general and the assistant comptroller general shall hold office during good behavior, but may be removed at any time by concurrent resolution of Congress after notice and hearing, when, in their judgment, the comptroller general or assistant comptroller general has been inefficient, or guilty of neglect of duty, or of malfeasance in office, and for no other cause and in no other manner.

Now, when it is proposed to remove the comptroller general and his assistant, the President is not taken into consideration, and inasmuch as the President is to be held primarily responsible for the conduct economically of the budget system, why this provision, which might permit a hostile Congress to remove the comptroller general and his assistant?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman understands, of course, that the comptroller general and assistant comptroller general have nothing to do with the transmission of the estimates or with their formulation or presentation to Congress. The comptroller general or assistant comptroller general have only to do with the auditing of accounts. In other words, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] expressed it in the course of his remarks a few moments ago, they make a post-mortem examination of the expenditures made by the Government. Now, it was the thought, and I am sure the gentleman will agree, that Congress, which makes the appropriations, should have the ultimate control of the expenditures; and the only way to do that was to provide that Congress should have independent officers to make report as to how the money was expended.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then the object of providing for the removal of the comptroller general and his assistant by Congress is to enable Congress to have a check on the administration in seeing that they properly perform the duties of their office?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is entirely correct. In other words, it is to do away with the present system, whereby the fund-spending department audits its own accounts, and provide that the fund-granting branch of the Government shall audit the expenditure of those grants.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Are the proposed functions of the comptroller general different in any great degree from those now performed by the Comptroller of the Treasury?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are not. They are practically the same thing. They will embrace principally his duties and the duties of the auditor. But I understand now, under the order issued by Secretary McAdoo, the auditors are under the Comptroller of the Treasury, so that you might say that the comptroller general's functions will be the same as those now performed by the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. WELLING. You say that the duties of the comptroller shall be taken over by the comptroller general?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And he can question the propriety of certain expenditures that do not meet his approval, whereas under the present conditions he has not that authority?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. I am glad the gentleman made that suggestion.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. YATES. On page 7 there is a provision for the comptroller general, and the provision already referred to, that unless removed by a concurrent resolution by Congress he shall remain in office until the age of 70. I would like to inquire what determines the term of office of the officers mentioned on page 1?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are subject to the will of the President.

Mr. YATES. They are subject to the will of the President?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. YATES. Like the Comptroller of the Currency, there is no fixed term?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is no fixed term.

Mr. YATES. And are the duties specifically defined here—the difference between the director of the budget and the assistant director of the budget and the comptroller general? The duties of the comptroller general seem to be set forth pretty amply. Where are defined the duties of the director and assistant director of the budget?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will find those duties set forth in section 2. Really the duties of the director of the budget are to advise the President in the matter of submitting estimates. They will be fixed by the President, and he will perform such duties as the President may desire him to perform, either in the way of investigation or advice or suggestion.

Mr. DUNBAR. May I ask if the relation of the head of the bureau of the budget with the President in the administration of the budget system is not somewhat similar to the position Col. HOUSE now occupies to the President?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I do not know just what the relations of Col. HOUSE are to the President, I will say to the gentleman; but I do know this, that under this law the director of the budget is expected to be a very close and confidential adviser of the President in respect to these particular matters.

Mr. DUNBAR. He should be, and it is evident that he will need some one in that close personal relation in order to enable him intelligently to perform the new duties that are proposed to be assigned to him.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is clearly correct.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. May I ask the gentleman one more brief question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I notice on page 7 of the bill that it provides that the comptroller general and assistant comptroller general may be removed by a majority of the two Houses for three specific reasons, and that it is expressly limited to those three. One of them is that he has been adjudged inefficient; and another, guilty of neglect of duty; and the other is malfeasance. He can not be removed for any other reason?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; not under this law.

Mr. DENISON. Would ill health be considered inefficiency? In the judgment of the gentleman from Tennessee, if he should fall into bad health, would that be considered inefficiency?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If his ill health was such as to prevent him from performing the duties of the office, I would say yes. Of course, that would be for the Congress to determine.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman thinks that the term "inefficiency" is broad enough to cover a case of protracted ill health. In the ordinary acceptation of the term that would not be so considered. A man might be very efficient, and yet be unable to perform the duties of his office by reason of ill health. Ordinarily the gentleman will understand that inefficiency does not cover a case of bad health or something of that kind.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I catch the force of the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. DENISON. For instance, I take it that no one would question the efficiency of the President at this time, but certainly he is in a very bad condition of health.

Mr. GARNER. I imagine that when you get into Committee of the Whole an amendment could be offered as to incapacity to fulfill the duties of the office.

Mr. DENISON. I ask the question for that reason.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I see no objection to the adoption of an amendment of that sort.

Mr. DENISON. That is the reason why I asked the question.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Does the gentleman believe that the language of the bill necessarily requires a supervision to the extent of rgulating the number of employees in any branch?

Mr. GARNER. Congress does that.

Mr. KINKAID. I understood the gentleman a while ago either to expressly say or to imply, at least, that these new officers would supervise the number of employees or advise as to whether there were too many employees.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. The gentleman misunderstood.

Mr. KINKAID. Or advise the President about gauging the appropriation based on the number of employees.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; I take it that if there was an estimate transmitted to the President for transmission to Congress by a certain bureau in which the bureau had stated that it needed a certain number of employees, or a certain amount of money in order to pay a certain number of employees, the President, if disposed to do so, could direct the director of the budget to report to him as to whether or not they were asking for too many; and if so, he could reduce them.

Mr. KINKAID. Then when making an estimate for the existing number of employees, which will be the case, I presume, in most instances, would the President be held responsible for the number of employees to be appropriated for?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is usually the case now.

Mr. KINKAID. Then, should the President raise the question of the number of employees? That is, does the bill contemplate that the President will be held responsible in that respect?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Exactly. The bill contemplates that the President will use this bureau of the budget for the purpose of making investigations of all the departments, year in and year out; that they will collect data showing the functions of the various bureaus, possibly their history, and so forth; their number of employees, just what they are doing, whether or not they are functioning properly, and so forth, and will have that data subject to the call of the President; and when he comes to revise these estimates and send them to Congress, he will have this data and also the advice of his director of the budget, so that he will know whether or not he can safely reduce them, or whether they should come to Congress as transmitted to him.

Mr. KINKAID. The gentleman will pardon me for not having read the bill. It is quite new to me. Now, is there any language contained in the bill which is express enough to impose this duty on the President, to scrutinize as to the number of employees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I have not had time to read the bill and I want to ask a question about something which may be embodied in the bill. I see on page 2, in section 2, it is provided that the President shall transmit to Congress an estimate of all appropriations necessary for carrying on the functions of the Government. Now, we are called upon from time to time to pass emergency appropriations. Will those have to be submitted by the President to Congress—the emergency appropriations?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. That is in the bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I had not read that far in the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will refer to page 6, section 8, of the bill, he will find that provision is made for the transmission of deficiency estimates and for expenditures under any new laws that may be passed by Congress.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Or for any deficiency that may occur under an old law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, I think it may well be said that the subject under discussion is one of the most important that has ever come before the Congress. To transform the finance system of the United States is a problem that may well attract the attention of the American people, and it surely should attract the attention of the representatives of the American people in the Congress.

The period during which we lived as a Nation before the war was one in which the revenues were collected from indirect sources, and those who paid the taxes really did not feel the burden. The total expenditures of the Government from the day the Declaration of Independence was proclaimed until the day the war against Germany was declared amounted to about $25,500,000,000. It may be information to the public to know that since the war began until the present time we have appropriated $51,500,000,000, and that the revenues which we derive now are not all by indirect taxation, but the great bulk of them is by direct taxation.

Until 1913 there was no income-tax law which enabled the Government to levy an income tax against the individual. To-day we have in our citizenship more than 3,000,000 men and women who pay income taxes.

The annual expenditure for the maintenance of all activities of the Government prior to America's entry into the war was about $1,500,000,000. Our bonded interest-bearing obligations before the war were less than $1,000,000,000. The average annual interest charge amounted to about $22,000,000.

When all the obligations resulting from the war are paid and all the contract obligations are settled, I think it is fair to say that the interest-bearing obligations of the United States will amount to about $34,000,000,000, and that the average annual interest and sinking-fund charge will be approximately $1,500,000,000. So we see at once that the interest charges against the Government in the future will be equal to the total cost of maintaining every activity of the Government prior to the war.

The citizens of the United States are to be taxed more heavily than they ever have been taxed before, not only for periods near but for periods remote. The burdensome taxation will be imposed not only upon those of the present generation but upon generations that are yet to come, and instead of having an annual charge for the maintenance of the Government of about $1,500,000,000 it is fair to assume that we are going to have an average annual budget amounting to about $5,000,000,000, and that most of this must be collected from the people in the form of direct taxation. We can not go to the people and ask them to buy bonds to meet the obligations of the Government. We must meet the expenses of the Government by direct taxation, and so we have reached a condition requiring reform in our system of finances.

There is a growing tendency among the American people to criticize the extravagance of the Congress, and a justly growing tendency to criticize the increasing extravagance of the executive branch of the Government. The men who are to be in public life in the future will be looked to to institute every economy that it is possible to introduce in order that the people of the United States may be relieved from burdensome taxation. And so we to-day, coming as we do with this proposition for legislation to reform the financial methods of the Government, appeal to the House and to the Senate to join in a movement calculated to be of infinite relief to the American people in the days to come.

The ship of state has been sailing on an uncharted sea. She has passed through one of the greatest storms that ever blew. She has reached a stage where she is water-logged. The captain of the ship is informed by the watch that he sees the danger lights ahead, and the captain orders a reckoning taken in order that the ship may not be cast upon the rocks. The storm has opened the seams of the ship. She is leaking at every pore. The engines have been put out of commission. They are unable to pump the water from the hold fast enough to keep the ship afloat. The piston rods have blown through the cylinder heads of the engines, the crown sheet has burned out because of the inability of the pumps to supply the boilers with water, and the ship is in danger of being foundered. The sailors have come to the rescue. They are pumping to the best of their ability, and we who have recommended the consideration of this bill may be classed as the sailors who are advancing the movement for the preservation of the ship of state.

We have had in all the years past a slipshod method of conducting the financial business of the United States. There has been no correlation in the legislative and executive branches of the Government. No one has been responsible, or, if so, no one has accepted the responsibility of recommending a budget to the Congress for the appropriations needed to maintain the Government.

Every bureau chief has felt that he had a right to make up an estimate of the needs of his bureau without respect to what anyone else might think about it, and every bureau chief with definite ideas has been anxious to make his bureau the most potent bureau in the Government.

In the Navy Department, with 11 bureaus, each bureau chief makes up what he thinks to be the needs of his bureau. He submits those needs to the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy compiles them in a single recommendation to the Secretary of the Treasury, but he does not feel that he has the power, even though he may have the right, to criticize or prune the recommendations made by the bureau chief.

The Assistant Secretary of the Navy, testifying before the Budget Committee, said that the Secretary of the Navy, or his assistants, felt that they had no power whatever to remedy any wrong that might result from the present method of making up estimates for bureau chiefs' needs. When he was asked if they did not have the power under the law to change the policy of the bureau chiefs he said he did not think they did. When he was asked if they had ever recommended a change in the law to give them the power he frankly admitted that they never had. But he said if some such system as we propose in this bill should be enacted into law he could almost guarantee the Navy Department would be conducted at 20 per cent less cost than it is to-day. That is a startling statement, but I think it could be done, and if it could be done in the Navy Department it could be done in each and every department of the Government.

Twenty per cent of $5,000,000,000, the annual estimated expenses of the Government, would be a billion dollars. A billion dollars per annum taken from the backs of the American taxpayers would be a great relief. It would lighten the load; it would enable the Congress to go back to the people and say that it had done the best that could be done. Every man in Congress ought to join in this movement. It is a movement bound to be approved by the American people.

All the bureau chiefs, the heads of all departments, now assemble their demands for financial needs for the conduct of their bureaus and departments and submit those demands to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, with the small clerical force at his command for that purpose, tabulates them and hands them over to the Congress for their consideration. But no one ever attempts to scrutinize the demands of the departments until they come before the committees of the Congress. I am proud to be able to say that Congress and the committees have scrutinized the estimates of the departments in the past, and in the past 20 years they have appropriated $500,000,000 less, if I recall, than the estimates that the departments called for. So that it can not well be said that the extravagance, if such there has been, can be laid at the doors of the Congress.

Now, what does this bill propose? It proposes that instead of an irresponsible system of making estimates for Government needs there shall be a scientific and responsible system. What is that scientific and responsible system to consist of? It is to impose on the President of the United States the responsibility of assembling all the estimates of the bureaus of every department and independent Government establishment and providing for such pruning in the estimates made by bureau chiefs and department heads as may be justified by the needs of the Government activities.

But it has been said by many that the President is too busy a man; that he is already overburdened with work and ought not to be charged with this new responsibility. My reply to that is that the President, being the only elective official that represents all the American people, is the only man upon whom the responsibility should be placed. The President alone has the power to say to every Cabinet officer that the expenditure within his department shall not exceed a certain amount within any given year, and he under this law, if it becomes a law, is to be furnished with an organ consisting of an organization presided over by a man who has sufficient executive ability to organize a force and to assemble information upon which the President may base an intelligent judgment.

The organization which it is proposed to create under this law will be the instrumentality by means of which the President will not only have the power but he will also have the facilities and the knowledge and the experience by which he will be able to present to the Congress a photograph of the annual Government needs and a statement of the revenues with which to meet those needs. The proposition will be, I assume, that when the President appoints a man the head of an organization, such as this bill proposes, he will appoint a man qualified to perform the onerous task to be imposed upon him. I assume that it will be one of the first functions of this organization to call upon every bureau chief within the Government to write a monograph of his own bureau, telling not only how the bureau came to be formed in the first instance, but what the activities of the bureau consist of. Not only shall this bureau chief be compelled to write the story of the functions of this bureau but the story of each activity under every function. In this way this organization, which is to be supplied to the President, will be constantly at work. It will become expert in the knowledge of the bases of the Government. Somebody will be enabled for the first time, then, to realize what the various activities of the Government mean, how they came to be established, what the purpose of each bureau is, what its function is in the Government, what extravagances, if any, have been practiced by the bureau in the past, and what economies may be introduced in the proper conduct of the bureau in the future. It has been said that the organization that is to be supplied to the President will assume superior jurisdiction over a Cabinet officer, and that, therefore, there will be friction in the various departments, but we all must remember that the bureau that we are supplying to the President is the instrumentality of the President, who is to be held personally responsible.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Would not a little friction sometimes be very healthful if applied just in that way?

Mr. MADDEN. It might be; but, after all, the bureau itself is only the instrumentality to furnish information to the President, and with the information in his possession the President will be able to sit at the Cabinet table and tell his Cabinet chiefs just what they ought to do, and if there is any friction anywhere he will be able to dispel it by deciding the question instantly. As it is to-day, under the law of 1909, called the Smith law, the Secretary of the Treasury assembles the estimates of the various departments, totals them, and if he finds, after submitting them to the House of Representatives, that the estimates of the expenditures are in excess of the estimates of the revenues, it then becomes his duty to send those estimates to the President with full information as to the facts, and it becomes in turn the duty of the President to make recommendations to the Congress as to how these estimates may be reduced, or if, in the judgment of the President, they are not possible of reduction, then, as an alternative, how the revenue may be raised to meet the increased expenditures. But the President has never functioned under that law. I believe, however, that the time has come when, if the President has the facilities to do the work, he will be very glad, indeed, to assume the responsibility, and it will not take much of his time, for he will have an expert corps of men who will be engaged every day in the year to ascertain the facts in connection with the conduct of every bureau in every department of the Government, and these facts will be supplied to the President in such form that it will not take any of his time, except to pass upon fundamentals.

The advantage in imposing upon the President the burden of creating a budget for submission to the Congress is this: The President will be compelled by the facts in the case, as he submits them, to defend his administration against the charge of extravagance, because if he recommends extravagant appropriations, as is frequently done now, it will be the function of the Congress then to criticize the President because of extravagance. The President submits every need of the Government at a given time, so far as he is able to find out what those needs may be, and the great debates of the country, in my judgment, will be had upon the question of the extravagance of Congress or the question of the extravagance of the administration. There will be nothing in the law to prohibit the Congress from increasing or decreasing the recommendations made by the President. If the President's recommendations are reasonable and economical, and the Congress increases them and makes them extravagant, then the Congress will be put upon its defense before the country and will be compelled to defend the extravagance which it inaugurates by increasing the recommendations made by the President.

If, on the other hand, the President pays no attention whatever to the economical side of the financial needs of the country, and the Congress in its wisdom decides to reduce materially the recommendations made by the President, it will be for the President to defend himself against extravagance which his recommendations indicate. With over 3,000,000 income taxpayers now, and more to come, the Nation is going to be more watchful than ever before of the expenditures made by the Government. I am glad that that is to be the case, because certainly the Government has been running wild, the ship has been rudderless, the captain has been off watch, and there has been no head who might be held responsible.

When this bill becomes a law, the great forum of America will find itself advised of every need of the Government by simply looking at the budget. There will then be for the first time an incentive on the one hand for the executive branch of the Government to defend its right of claim to efficiency and economy and to charge extravagance to the Congress, and, on the other hand, an opportunity for the Congress to defend its claim to economy and efficiency and the charge of extravagance against the executive branch of the Government. This will give the picture as no other method could do. We will have a picture of America's needs, and when the departments, from the President down, realize that they must defend their right to the confidence of the people by the practice of proper economy, you can rest assured that they will understand why they are extravagant before they become so. If they know in advance that they are going to be obliged to defend their right to the people's confidence, they will study the needs of the Government for the first time, and they will continue to study those needs for all time, and they will be in a position, if criticism is leveled at them, of being able to answer the criticism and defend themselves.

On the other hand, to-day we have an indiscriminate criticism of Congress for extravagant methods, and that is probably easily accounted for. It is easier to criticize men in the mass than it is to criticize the individual, and it is perhaps easier for men in the mass to be extravagant because of their ability to shift the load of responsibility onto the shoulders of some one else than it will be for the individual, when the limelight of publicity is leveled at his actions, to escape the responsibility of criticism by any subterfuge.

We propose in this bill not only to do what I have indicated, but also to create a comptroller and auditor general, who is to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose term of office shall be during good behavior, who shall not be dismissible by the President under any circumstances, and who shall be retired from the office to which he is appointed only for certain well-defined reasons provided in the bill, and then only as the result of the enactment of legislation by the Congress. It is proposed to create this auditor and comptroller general so that he may be able to pass on all of the legal phases of every expenditure and at the same time audit the accounts and to make him so independent of the executive branch of the Government that no influence of any kind can be exercised over him in the discharge of his duties. If I have my way, when this legislation is completed, I shall propose the creation of a great committee of the House, to be known as the committee on expenditures, consisting of the best men in the House—because it is to be a great committee if it is created—to whom this auditor and comptroller general may report from day to day, and through that medium supply the House of Representatives and the Senate with such information as to what is being done with the money appropriated as to keep the Congress advised in connection with every step taken.

In this way we will have a check against the executive branch of the Government not only as to the methods of appropriating but as to the method of expenditure, and my judgment is that the foundation of the future financial system of economy could not be laid so well in any other way as by the adoption of the bill which is now before you for consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Will my friend yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. CRISP. I have listened to the gentleman with much interest. I think it is a splendid bill, and I am in favor of it, and I know my friend is one of the best legislators in the House. I would like to have him give his views as to whether it is advisable or not to follow this step by concentrating all appropriations in one committee of the House?

Mr. MADDEN. Personally I am in favor of that. Of course, in the establishment of a single committee of the House you have one responsible body through which you can deal with the recommendations of the President. You have the responsibility placed where no duplication can be had in connection with appropriations. It is true that no one committee of the House in itself could adjudicate all recommendations made for the expenditures of the Government. Whether you make one committee or more, this committee would have to be divided into subcommittees, as the Committee of Appropriations to-day is, and I apprehend that when the House passes this bill, and the Senate concurs, we will find ourselves in a position where we will be glad to formulate the other section of reform indicated by the question of the gentleman from Georgia. For, after all, it would not be wise, nor would it be fair, to say that the only end of the Government that needs to be reformed is the executive. We can not afford to go before the people and say that we have already acted by requiring the President to defend his claim to economy unless we put ourselves in the attitude of meeting the issue and being in a position to do likewise.

Mr. CRISP. I want to say I thoroughly agree with the gentleman and I am very glad to have his views on it.

Mr. MADDEN. You can not make this reform too sweeping for me, and I want to say to the gentlemen here and elsewhere that it makes no difference to me what committee I am on. Some people think that they must be on a particular committee to have any influence in the House. Now, I would sooner be on the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union than any committee in the House, and my certificate of election is the only thing I need for that. I am under no obligation to any committee on committees for that place, and there all the legislation that is enacted by the Congress is considered under the five-minute rule and there you get real, legitimate consideration. So, after all, these men who may feel aggrieved at the possibility in advance of losing some prestige somewhere because they have not got a particular committee, it seems to me really are getting agitated too far in advance. Every man here knows that if you want to keep your head above the waves of this House you have got to keep swimming all the time. [Applause.] You can not rest on the merits of the achievement that you accomplished yesterday. It makes no difference how great a thing you accomplished yesterday you are only one of the common herd to-morrow, and you have got to live on what you can produce by industry, not genius. There is no genius here more than there is anywhere else. The man who works, has industry, has system, has integrity, has courage to meet the issue, has the facts to present to the House, does not have to be an orator any more than I am. All he needs is to have the facts, have industry, courage, and integrity of purpose, and he will make a good Member of Congress, and that is what we hope to make out of every man here if there are any here who are not good Members of Congress, and I doubt if there are; I have no idea there are. So I say we can not reform the executive end of the Government without reforming ourselves, and for one I am proud to have been permitted to serve on this committee on the budget with the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], who is chairman of the committee, and who has worked in season and out of season to produce the good that is to flow from the legislation that is to follow the work of this great committee over which he has presided with such great distinction. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. How are we going to reform ourselves in the face of the crack of the bull whip that comes once in a while like we had yesterday and this morning?

Mr. MADDEN. I have never heard of such a thing as the crack of the whip since I have been a Member of Congress, and I have been here for a good many years. I have been as free and independent in my action as air. No man living during the years of my service in Congress has ever told me what to do. Neither one of my constituents nor any man has presumed to tell me what to do here. Every man here is equal. Each man counts for what he is worth. Some men count for more, some for less; it depends on their industry——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think that in the face of such speeches as were made here by the two ex-Speakers of the House, one on each side of the aisle, by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and by other strong Members of this Congress, that anyone could have withstood that eloquence and logic other than by the crack of the bull whip?

Mr. MADDEN. Every man here is here with the right to express his thoughts. If he has views, he has a right to express them. If his views are such as to bring around him a following that other men do not happen to have, that is his good fortune, and the country is fortunate, too, if he is the right-thinking kind of a man. The two great ex-Speakers of the House are men who have stood the test of American confidence. [Applause.]

They are entitled to the respect and the confidence of every right-thinking American. They have views, and they have the courage to express them. They have never faltered in the patriotic discharge of their duty. And I am proud to be able to stand upon this floor and say that it has been my privilege and my pleasure and that I consider it a great honor to have had the opportunity to sit at the feet of these great men mentioned by the gentleman from Texas.

One more word and I shall close. I wish to say that no greater chance to perform a patriotic service has ever fallen to the lot of any man living under the flag than the opportunity afforded to support the great measure now before the Congress. I predict that with this measure enacted into law economy in Government expenditures will result, system will be inaugurated where chaos now reigns, and opportunity for information to the American people, such as has never been afforded before, will be at the disposition of any man who cares to know about the finances of his country. And there can be no doubt that a system of economy is bound to result when we throw the limelight of publicity upon the acts not only of the Congress and of its individual Members, but on the President and every man who owes allegiance to him in the executive branches of the Government. I thank you. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if there is any Member on either side of the Chamber who wishes to speak in opposition to the bill? If so, I will be glad to yield him time at this moment. If not, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma permit me to propound a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. It develops now within a very short time after general debate has begun that there is no opposition on the floor of this House to the budget bill now under consideration. Then, if that is the case, why take up 12 hours of the Congress in debate of the measure when you can not find any opposition to it on the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not stated a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD] will proceed.

Mr. BLANTON. I thought the Chair was in control of the time of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, referring to the question propounded by the gentleman from Texas, I would be so delighted to see this bill pass that, as far as the little time I am going to consume is concerned, if we could take an immediate vote and make this bill a part of the laws of this country, I would gladly yield my privilege. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I am especially delighted at the manner in which this bill and the proposition to establish a budget system for the United States Government is being received by the Members of Congress. I am especially delighted that I have had an opportunity to participate in the hearings and in drawing this measure, because it calls to my mind that for many years, along with my good colleague, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE], when neither he nor I was a Member of this body, but when we were members of another organization studying the great problems of taxation and the expenditure of public moneys as members of the National Tax Association, I have been urging a budget system not only for the National Government but for all State, city, and county governments.

And I am especially glad that the time seems now to have come when the United States Government, through the adoption of this bill, will set the precedent by which all Governments will look closely and further and with more business interest toward the expenditure of public moneys.

I consider that this is probably the most important measure that has or will come before this special session of Congress. Those who have given careful thought to this matter realize that a budget system is not only necessary now, but has been for years past. There is another feature in connection with this legislation that is pleasing to me, and that is the fact that it partakes not at all of a political nature. I am especially delighted that this Congress has risen in this matter far above political lines and that the leaders and the big men of the country in and out of Congress, both Democrats and Republicans, are joining in the support of this much-needed reform.

It was very gratifying to me when ex-President Taft, Gov. Lowden of Illinois, Secretary of the Treasury Carter Glass, the Hon. Swagar Sherley, and the Hon. John J. Fitzgerald, and other prominent men who have given a study to Government finances came before the committee and indorsed the committee's efforts to bring forth a fair and efficient budget measure. I believe it is an omen that the Government is going to improve its administration of affairs and that we have finally reached a conclusion that Government must be administered in a more economical and simplified manner. And I trust that this will establish a precedent, and that we will get together on other great measures, as we are together on this, and do something real in behalf of the people of this country.

Now, when this measure becomes a law we may not all agree as to the method of carrying out its provisions on the floor and in the committees of the House, but let me urge upon the Congress that we need not let this enter into our feelings as to the passage of this bill. Let us establish the budget system, now that we have an opportunity, and after its establishment if there are flaws they can be remedied. Congress has always risen, and always will rise, to the position of doing the right thing and in handling questions properly as they come before it, and I urge that we do not let our differences of opinion as to the enforcement of this budget system in our own House interfere with our votes as to the passage and the initiation of a budget system.

I have for years been very much interested in the establishment of a budget system, and my interest in this system has grown out of my experience as a public official and the consequent knowledge of public expenditure and the raising of revenues gained from the public service.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will my friend from Oklahoma yield for a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUDSPETH. As I understand, I will say to the gentleman, from the casual reading of this bill, the enforcement of this budget system is provided for in the bill?

Mr. HOWARD. No.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to have the gentleman's idea upon the enforcement.

Mr. HOWARD. I was referring to the question, as did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], of the number of committees we had to handle in the House.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I did not understand just what the gentleman meant by the enforcement. As I understood, the President submits the estimates to Congress.

Mr. HOWARD. My language was perhaps a little bit misleading, but what I was referring to was how the matter should be handled in the House.

As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, my support of the budget system has come by reason of my experience in the matter of expending and raising public revenues. For four years I was the purchasing agent of my State and expended practically all of the money that it expended for State government. Then for four years I was the State auditor for my State, and audited all of the bills against public revenues. And I want to say right here, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that if this bill went no further than to that paragraph or section creating a comptroller general and concentrating the payment of all bills and the settlement of all claims against the United States in one department with a determined authority, it would be sufficient and great and beneficial legislation. I consider, Mr. Chairman, that this one section of the bill will be very beneficial, and will prove to be a very economic one and a benefit to the taxpayers of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the rapidity with which public expenditures have increased is amazing and shocking. Too much of a tendency to live on, and not under, the Government has been developed.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, I am a new Member of the Congress, and I do not want to be understood as criticizing, but rather desire to take the position of suggesting. In my opinion—and I believe it can be substantiated by an investigation—both our National, State, and municipal governments employ too many people. There is too great a degree of multiplication of service, and beyond question there is too great a tendency to purchase too much material and supplies for use in public service. I want it understood, however, Mr. Chairman, that I am in no way criticizing the present or past administrations when I make the suggestion that too many people are employed in government and that too much money is wasted in the purchase of materials and supplies, because if a condition of useless and extravagant expenditure of public money does exist at this time it is due to the fact that the present system of collecting and spending public moneys has been handed down to us as a legacy from other years. In fact, I can remember, Mr. Chairman, when I was a boy in Kentucky, of hearing my father and his neighbors complain of heavy taxes and how the burdens of government seemed to increase instead of decrease.

Mr. Chairman, the proposition of increased burden of government is one with which we will continually have to contend. Why, Mr. Chairman, when I was a boy in a little town in the hills of Kentucky, if some fellow had come into that town and suggested that he was going to teach the boys of that little town how to become carpenters, the old town carpenter down there, who built what few buildings we had, or repaired them, would have taken a hand ax and would have run that fellow out of that town, and he would have said, "I have been training the boys of this community to become carpenters for many years, and I have made of them good carpenters, and we do not need you down here." Likewise, if some one had gone into that community when I was a boy and said, "I am going to teach the girls how to cook," she would have insulted every grandmother down there, because the grandmothers would have maintained that they had been making good cooks out of the girls there ever since the history of Kentucky had begun and they could continue to do so.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the people demanded domestic-science departments, and they demanded manual-training departments, in their schools, and it was well that they should have them. But now that they have been established, it is also well to bear in mind that in having them they must pay for them. But it is also well, Mr. Chairman, that we as legislators or public officials of the State or the Federal Government should bear in mind that as these demands upon us for increased functions of government are made, in meeting them we should also in every way possible provide for maintaining what the people desire on the most economical basis possible. As a matter of fact, I doubt if any system that we adopt in the matter of spending public moneys will reduce the amount of public money to be expended as compared with what we are spending under normal conditions. As the Government increases, the expenditures are going to increase, and it is my opinion that a good budget system, properly carried out, as we anticipate in this bill, will and should stop the waste in public expenditures.

The old method of collecting and spending public moneys has had its day. The people are not now, and have not been for some time past, satisfied with that system. They are not satisfied with a system that collects from them extraordinary amounts of money in the name of taxation, and then spends it in a haphazard manner, without thought and careful attention, such as a private citizen would give to the expenditure of his private funds.

Mr. Chairman, the expenditures for government must be looked squarely in the face as a problem to be solved before they assume proportions more disconcerting. The evil against which the national budget system would operate is the multiplication of Government functionaries, which is one of the most ancient evils with which we have to deal; it is this multiplication of Government functionaries which I most fear in the matter of economical government. Under the old system a multiplication of governmental departments and employees has grown until the people of this country are staggering under the burden. I was once asked the question as to what was the attitude of the taxpayers toward public expenditures. My reply to same was, and is, if the taxpayers of this country would really give serious thought to public expenditure of money, what they would say about it would not look well in print and we could not repeat it to our wives, mothers, and daughters. Why did I and why do I say that? Because an analysis of public expenditures, in my opinion, shows that in this Government, and in each State and in each municipality in this country, too many people are employed in public service. In the past, Congress, State legislatures, and many kinds of tax levying and tax enforcing bodies have given great thought and study to the manner of levying and enforcing tax laws, but I have never known and can find but very little history which records that any of us have given thought and study in a scientific manner to the expenditure of public moneys. And I say to the Congress that we have reached the time where it is more necessary that we give thought and study to the expenditure of money than we do to the levying and collecting of taxes. It makes no difference financially to the victim what becomes of his money, whether it is taken from him by a highwayman at the point of a polished revolver or in the name of taxation. I do not say that the taxpayers of this country have been robbed, but I do say that a system of multiplication in government has grown until much money is being spent for governmental purposes that could be saved to the taxpayers if a proper and scientific renovating of our system was made.

There must be in this country not only a reform in the expenditure of moneys but there must be a reform in taxation, because business is staggering and suffering under the burdens under which we are now laboring, and unless relief to business from taxation is given in some manner in the very near future I fear the result. There must be a scientific renovating of our system, and I believe that a proper and scientific renovation is at hand in the adoption of the bill that we now have before us.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman kindly call to our attention some case illustrating multiplication of work in any departments of the Government, so as to show the importance of preventing that?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes. A few days ago I called the attention of this House to a case when, as State auditor of the State of Oklahoma, I had made an analysis of the employees of the Government and of that State, and I found that in the State of Oklahoma there are about 1,100 people employed in health work. For instance, we have down there a city health department, a county health department, a State health department, and regulations and activities of the Federal Public Health Service, with the result that, with different rules and regulations, before the health laws can be enforced the only person who is needed is the undertaker. [Laughter.]

Another case: As I stated a few days ago on the floor of the House, in that same analysis I discovered that a part of my State is below the quarantine line, and they had started to eradicate the cattle tick. As State auditor of the State of Oklahoma I found that we had traveling over that State something like 50 men on a salary and expense account eradicating the cattle tick in Oklahoma and preparing it to be put above the quarantine line. I found that at the same time the National Government had about 40 or 50 men traveling over the State of Oklahoma engaged in the same work of attempting to eradicate the cattle tick—40 or 50 men in the employment of the State enforcing the law and 40 or 50 men in the employment of the Federal Government enforcing the same law. These fellows had different ideas as to what they should do. They had different ideas as to the best solution in which to dip the cattle. They had different ideas as to what was the proper material out of which to build the vats.

They quarreled about this and that. The result was that in some of the counties the cattlemen got sore, and there were some vats blown up. In many instances, as a result of this double work and these conflicting opinions, when they finally got together and ready to enforce the quarantine law the cow had died of old age and the ravages of the tick. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman kindly explain how this legislation will relieve that situation?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know that this legislation will relieve that situation, but in speaking on this bill I am only taking occasion to call attention to a condition that exists. Certainly if we go into a study of economic government, and establish functions for studying it, some attention may be given to conditions of this kind, and if we are to get free of the burdens of taxation somebody will devise some remedy and cut out the multiplicity of work that is now being done by the States and the Federal Government.

Illustrations of the multiplicity of public work can be cited without limit, and remedies must be sought and found. The necessity for economy can not be denied. To my mind the adoption of a budget system as provided in this bill will be a long step toward the solution of this question. In these days when there is a constant and loud complaint because of growing tax burdens and increase of expenditure, very much thought is being given to the cause thereof. I believe that one of the most satisfactory ways in which to meet the situation is the adoption of a budget system as set forth in this bill, which will not only relieve the feeling of discontent among the taxpayers but should put the Government on an efficient and economical basis.

The budget should show, and I am sure will under this bill, the actual financial condition and estimates as to the future based on these conditions. This might not mean the lessening of expenditures, for necessarily as the Government and population grow legitimate expenditures must increase. But waste must be stopped, and under a budget system as provided for in this bill I believe it will be stopped. We must seek to spend our money for proper requirements. As our population grows and various forms of government take on new functions, so there will be an increase in expenditures. The duty of the budget as provided for in this measure will be to see that the expenditures are made for proper purposes. The budget system means that there must be estimates of needs and estimates of resources that may be available to meet such needs.

The budget system, in my opinion, is a cure for invisible government. It means practical executive supervision; it means the careful expenditure of the people's money; it means strict accountability; it means publicity; and it means administration preparedness.

And I urge that this bill will properly protect the people in all sections of the country, and assure to the overburdened taxpayers relief from the burden of taxes under which they are now suffering—burdens of taxation for which no party or administration is responsible but which have come down to us from a system that may have been good in the early days of the Republic, but owing to the growth of our country and the economic conditions has become obsolete and faulty. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, when a boy of 12 years of age gets his first job at 50 cents a day he does not need to devise a very elaborate system for keeping track of his income and his expenditures, but whatever system would be devised, if there were system to it, would be called a budget. Now, when this same boy becomes a man and establishes himself in some line of business that involves, as does the mercantile business, a multitude of transactions that have to do with expenditures aggregating hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars, the system or scheme that must be worked out by which he will keep track of his income and his expenditures may also very properly be called a budget, but it will be a budget of very comprehensive character. For the boy a budget may be desirable; for the man a budget is necessary.

Now, the same proposition holds good for the Government. When we became a Government our expenditures were very small in comparison with our expenditures to-day. Not only were they small in total amounts, but they were small proportionately.

Our population in 1790 was less than four million, and our total average expenditures for the first five years after our organization as a Government were less than $6,000,000 per year. To be exact, our population in 1790 was 3,929,625, and our average expenditure for the first five years' history of our country aggregated $5,854,172. This was equal to $1.34 per capita. At that time the problem of government was one that had to do with a very limited number of agencies, which chiefly had to do with policing the Nation through an Army and a Navy, administering justice in so far as this was involved in making and executing national laws, maintaining our place internationally, and providing revenues for these purposes. Matters that to-day are regarded as of prime importance as Government functions were, in the early days of our history, carried forward by private individuals or else were not attended to at all. Gradually, however, with our development as a Nation, we came to regard as responsibilities belonging to the Government as a whole a multitude of matters that in the early days had no part under the Government, or, if at all considered, were handled in most simple fashion. But our Government developed and our national wants increased, until in the middle of the last century our per capita expenditures, instead of being $1.34, had mounted up to about $2.25 in 1850 and $5.70 in the period of 1880 and $8.85 in 1900 and $11.14 in 1916 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. Our population that year was estimated at 100,000,000 people and our expenditures were $1,114,937,012.

It will be seen that while our population had increased from less than four million to one hundred million—or, in other words, had multiplied itself by 25—our expenditures had increased from less than $6,000,000 to more than $1,000,000,000—or, in other words, had multiplied itself two hundred times.

Now, if our expenditure in 1916, which was the last year before the Great War, had been upon the basis per capita of our expenditure during the first five years of our country's history, we would have expended in 1916 to maintain our Government not $1,114,000,000 but $134,000,000. This suggests why we have come to a time when we should have a definite budget system.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman has stated that two years ago our expenditures had so increased that they amounted to $11 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. It is estimated now that our expenditures during the coming years, without any reduction in the amount of our annual debts, will approximate $5,000,000,000 per year, and on a basis of $5,000,000,000 our expenses will amount to $50 a year for every man, woman, and child, so that while two or three years ago they amounted to $11, we now have to look forward to an expenditure of $50.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, if the gentleman's figures prove to be correct, as the years go by, it is all the more reason why we should have a budget system. I have purposely omitted discussing the large expenses of the last two years, because I wanted to take the Government under normal conditions. For that reason I mentioned 1916.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FRENCH. Just briefly.

Mr. DUNBAR. I want to ask the gentleman if the conditions will not be normal which will require an expenditure of $5,000,000,000?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not doubt that under normal conditions expenses will be greatly increased over what they were two or three years ago, but just how much I do not know.

Now, in what way are our expenses increasing? Is there a way by which they can be cut down?

My own notion is, with regard to the expenditure of public money, that we should determine the necessity for the expenditure; that we should determine whether or not that which is accomplished by the expenditure of money is wise and beneficial for the people; we should determine whether or not that which is done had best be done by the Government or by private initiative. Then, if it shall be determined that the problem is one for the Government to meet instead of the private individual, our responsibility is to see to it that under the Government it shall be carried forward with the utmost regard for the public interest from the standpoint of expense.

To show how the Government has expanded, let me call attention to one or two of the agencies of government.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Take the Post Office Department. Why, the first year after our Government was formed we had 75 post offices throughout the then United States. To-day we have more than 50,000 post offices. During the first five years of our country's history we expended on an average $83,784 per year. In other words, 2 cents per capita to maintain the Post Office Department was what it cost our people annually during the first five years of our country's history; just one postage stamp of to-day for every man, woman, and child was all that was necessary for an entire year. Well, most of our people could not read and write; we did not have any newspapers and periodicals; we had few magazines, and, in fact, in this line we were leading rather the simple life.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Briefly.

Mr. STEVENSON. Would the gentleman inform us what the postage was at that time? Was it not 25 cents on the letter?

Mr. FRENCH. Probably so. I do not have the figures, but I am not talking of the rate on the individual letter. The gentleman's ancestors may have placed 25 cents on a particular letter to send it, but when they were doing that there were dozens of others who were not mailing letters at all. I am speaking of the average per individual. It was 2 cents per individual at that time, compared with upwards of $3 per individual to-day.

The reason why that has come about is the general education of our people and demands made by people who are educated.

Why, our people can all read and write—that is, most of them—including the children. We have a multitude of magazines and newspapers published throughout the United States, and families think that they are badly abused unless they can take their proportionate share of publications. We all write letters. Our people are closely knit together from one end of the country to the other by means of the Post Office Department.

In 1918 we had 54,345 separate post offices, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, our expenditures for the maintenance of that department were $324,833,728, in comparison with $32,140 in 1790, or, in other words, we expended $3.06 per capita for the maintenance of our Post Office Department.

Would you abolish the Post Office Department and thus save the money? Of course you would not. The Post Office Department means more than the handling of letters; it means our post office money order system; it means the delivery of publications; it means the free rural delivery system for the people of our country; it means the city carrier system in our cities and the delivery of mail two or three times a day; it means the maintenance of the parcels post. In other words, it means the maintenance of a multitude of agencies that the people of our country regard quite as essential to living at the beginning of the twentieth century as was the maintenance of the 75 post offices quite essential to the living of our forefathers in 1790.

AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT.

There was no such thing as a Department of Agriculture until nearly a hundred years after our country was born, and it was nearly 50 years after our beginning as a Nation before the first appropriation was made along lines that are usually considered as the essential reasons for the maintenance of the department. True, we had built roads and canals in the early days, but we did so not from the standpoint of agriculture, but from the standpoint of military necessity, the standpoint of defense; to some extent, possibly, from the standpoint of commerce.

In 1839, however, the Congress appropriated $1,000 for the purchase of seeds to help out the farming sections of the country when it seemed advisable that from a national standpoint the Government should assist. But it was 20 years later than that before our appropriations along lines that we recognize as agricultural in character amounted to more than $40,000. In fact, in 1860 the appropriation was $40,000. In 1888 the Department of Agriculture was given the rank of a Cabinet department, and that year the Congress appropriated $971,823 for its maintenance. The appropriation for the year 1918 was $33,986,487.

Would we abolish the Agriculture Department? Would we give over the assistance that is being furnished the plant industry throughout the United States, that is being furnished to the cotton growers of the South, that is being furnished to the grain producers of the West, that is being furnished to the growers of fruit in the New England States or on the Pacific coast; would we abandon the work of eradication of pests that destroy our crops; would we abandon the fight against disease that exterminates cattle or horses or hogs? Rather, there probably is nowhere an expenditure of $33,000,000 that in results brings such tremendous profits as the expenditure of the $33,000,000 through the Agriculture Department of our country. Yet, gentlemen, that cost alone is more than it cost to maintain the Government of the United States during all of the first five years of the history of our country.

A BILLION-DOLLAR NATION.

I have mentioned the development of our country and have referred to two of the departments by way of illustration. We have numerous other departments and the expenditure in all of them aggregates upward of $1,000,000,000. In other words, instead of being a small Nation with limited income and with limited expenses, we have become an immense Nation, maintained at stupendous cost, and I take it that the people are in such harmonious demand for the maintenance of the different agencies of Government, and believe that these agencies can be better carried on through the Government taking the lead or initiative than through private means, that we shall never again fall below approximately the billion-dollar sum for the annual maintenance of our public affairs.

CRITICS—TRUE AND FALSE.

During the last several years especially there has been considerable discussion of the budget question, and criticisms have been made of the Government and of Congress on the subject to which I want to give very brief attention.

There are two kinds of critics—the true and the false. The true critic who discusses the budget system knows what he is talking about and his discussions are always helpful, no matter whether his point of view and conclusions are right or wrong. The false critic, however, is the one who criticizes at so much per line in the press or magazines and so much per speech on the platform, and who is rather careless touching facts and conditions of which he pretends to be advised. These latter critics, who are more profuse than the former, as a matter of fact, seem to know little about the structure of their Government and nothing that I can discover that is worth while touching the budget question. Congress, being made up of a great many Members, is quite a safe object for attack, and so these critics find it rather profitable to themselves to hurl broadside charges at Congress and hold up before their audiences or readers the extravagance of the country, placing the responsibility for the extravagance upon Congress. I want to call to your attention figures that will show the estimates made to Congress by the various departments for expenditures asked for year by year, together with the appropriations made by Congress in recognition of these requests. The table that I am including begins with 1897 and runs down to 1916—a period of 20 years. The last year is the year before the Great War, and the period is practically a normal time.

Comparative statement exhibiting, for the 20-year period covering the fiscal years 1897 to 1916, inclusive, the grand total of estimates submitted by the Executive and the grand total of appropriations granted by the Congress.

Net excess of estimates			555,620,614.67

Now, what does the table show? It shows that the departments have asked for appropriations amounting to $18,020,860,868.38. It also shows that Congress made appropriations of $17,465,240,253.71. It shows that in all but two years the Congress refused to appropriate as much as the departments asked for and that the sum total saved by the Congress over what the departments asked for aggregated $555,620,614.67. Now, during this period of 20 years, in 1903 the Congress appropriated a little less than $25,000,000 in excess of the department estimates. This excess is explained when I say that that year Congress appropriated $50,130,000 for the construction of the Panama Canal, which was not included in the estimates. Also, in 1912 Congress appropriated a little less than $400,000 more than the departments asked for, but this will not seem surprising when I say that of the amount appropriated by Congress that year $8,000,000 of that was for the Post Office Department, in addition to that which the department had asked for. This amount was made necessary largely by reason of the extension of the rural delivery system.

If I were to take the last two years instead of the 20 years before the European war, I would show you estimates of the departments in excess of appropriations of between one and two billions of dollars; and if I were to take the years preceding the 20-year period referred to, I would still show you appropriations much less than the estimates made by the departments.

Now, what does this mean? Why, it means that the departments and not the Congress are the ones that are extravagant, and I may say that my experience in Congress has been that the departments are constantly making demands, while it requires every energy of the Members of Congress to keep the appropriations down. Under our present system department officers haunt our offices, press themselves upon Members of Congress in the Capitol, and even, as I have seen them, day after day sit in the galleries to see what Members are opposing or advocating the pet plans that the departments are pressing upon Congress.

Again, there are some critics who urge a budget system, and about their only excuse lies in the public buildings and grounds appropriations. Why, gentlemen, from the foundation of our Government down to 1917 the total appropriations for public buildings, including sites, repairs, restorations of buildings, and so forth, aggregate $351,938,000. Now, from the beginning of our Government down to June 30, 1917, the total expense of government had been $40,000,000,000. In other words, all the appropriations for public buildings make an amount less than 1 per cent of the total running expenses of the Government, and yet these critics would magnify these amounts and try to make the country believe that the Government was spendthrift and extravagant on the basis of this very small percentage of expenditure on the part of the Government. Even if the entire amount had been unworthily spent, the amount would be less than 1 per cent; but the fact of the matter is that most of the money appropriated for even public buildings and grounds has been wisely spent, and, of course, in this amount must be included the necessary public buildings not only in Washington but in all the great cities of the country.

And then when it comes to rivers and harbors appropriations, the total spent by the Government up to 1915 was $980,000,000, or less than 2½ per cent of the moneys appropriated for the maintenance of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I resent these false statements that are indulged in by false critics. I resent the activities of such false critics from the standpoint of the public good. The anarchist is limited in his activity to the distance that his bomb will carry destruction, but the false critic, the man who deliberately undermines the confidence of the people in their public service, is worse than the anarchist, because the poison that he distributes goes far and wide, and while it does not directly destroy buildings, as does the bomb of the anarchist, it furnishes the media for the propagation of anarchy and thereby the overthrow of orderly government. One of the greatest assets that a country can have is a government in which the people can have confidence.

I have served in Congress with members of various political parties. I have opposed them upon the rostrum and in the political campaigns and on the floor of this Chamber, but I could not say other than that the overwhelming number of Members of Congress, and of public officers generally, with whom I have come in contact have had the interest and well-being of their country at heart and have been citizens who would not sell the responsibility that has been imposed upon them for the weight of the world in gold. The Congress makes mistakes, administration officers make mistakes, but it should be written in the heart and conscience of every citizen of our Republic that, for the most part, their public officials ring true and are laboring as they see it for the cause that will mean the greatest good to the people they represent.

THE NEED OF A BUDGET.

For a good many years thoughtful people have come to realize that we ought to have a budget system. Now, there is nothing magic about the word "budget"; all that it means is an orderly estimate, by a proper agency of our Government, of the needs of the Government in all its departments for the approaching year and a proper and careful estimate of the prospective revenues for the same year. Now, that is all there is to the matter. The problem that we have before us is devising the proper agency and indicating just what that agency shall have to do.

It goes without saying that our present system is wrong. We do have something of a budget; we do have something of an estimate of the expenditures and of the prospective revenues. The trouble is it is not carefully worked out and it is not presented to our country by the responsible agencies having to do with its administration in a comprehensive, compact, and lucid form.

Under the law it is made the duty—of the heads of the several executive departments, and of such other officers authorized or required to make estimates, to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before the 15th day of October of each year, their annual estimates for the public service, to be included in the Book of Estimates prepared by law under his direction, and in case of failure to furnish estimates as herein required it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be prepared in the Treasury Department, on or before the 1st day of November of each year, estimates for such appropriations as, in his judgment, shall be requisite in every such case, which estimates shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared by law under his direction for the consideration of Congress. (Mar. 3, 1901, Stat. L., vol. 31, p. 1009, sec. 5.)

The statutes further provide that—

All annual estimates for the public service shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared under his direction. (R. S., sec. 3669.)

The statutes further provide—

All estimates of appropriations and estimates of deficiencies in appropriations intended for the consideration and seeking the action of any of the committees of Congress shall be transmitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and in no other manner; and the said Secretary shall first cause the same to be properly classified, compiled, indexed, and printed, under the supervision of the chief of the division of bookkeeping and warrants of his department. (July 7, 1884, Stat. L., vol. 23, p. 254, sec. 2.)

The act of March 4, 1909, provides that—

Immediately upon the receipt of the regular annual estimates of appropriations needed for the various branches of the Government it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to estimate as nearly as may be the revenues of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year, and if the estimates for appropriations, including the estimated amount necessary to meet all continuing and permanent appropriations, shall exceed the estimated revenues the Secretary of the Treasury shall transmit the estimates to Congress as heretofore required by law and at once transmit a detailed statement of all said estimates to the President, to the end that he may, in giving Congress information of the state of the Union and in recommending to their consideration such measures as he may judge necessary, advise the Congress how in his judgment the estimated appropriations could with least injury to the public service be reduced so as to bring the appropriations within the estimated revenues, or, if such reduction be not in his judgment practicable without undue injury to the public service, that he may recommend to Congress such loans or new taxes as may be necessary to cover the deficiencies. (Mar. 4, 1909, Stat. L., vol. 35, p. 1027, sec. 7.)

In a word, these sections provide that the different agencies of the Government—the various departments, commissions, bureaus, and what not—shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury at stated periods estimates of the moneys required for the handling of their respective lines of work for the approaching year. It was the idea when these laws were passed that it would enable the President to work out a budget through the Secretary of the Treasury and present that budget to the Congress. But for some reason or other administrations have not chosen to so regard the law, and all that it amounts to is that the Secretary of the Treasury's office becomes one for the assembling of the estimates of the different departments, and without further analysis by the administration, without checking the estimates over to see how they overlap or how they might properly be reduced or how they fit in with prospective revenues, they are transmitted to the Congress. In other words, the Secretary of the Treasury, under our present system, performs just as useful a function and just as responsible a piece of work in every particular as could be performed by the janitor of the Treasury Department in transmitting the several documents to the legislative body. The Treasury Department, however, furnishes for the information of the Congress an estimate of the prospective revenues for the approaching year. Now, when this information is furnished to the Congress it is distributed to the various committees that have to do with the shaping of appropriation bills. These committees do not articulate. They have nothing in common; they work out the appropriations for the several departments independently, and the only common ground, the only meeting ground in this legislative body, where these measures can be considered and compared is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and later in the House of Representatives itself, but as the bills are not reported at one time no satisfactory comparison can be made by the Committee of the Whole. Appropriation bills are reported by eight different committees. Revenue bills, for the most part, are reported by only one committee, though, properly speaking, quite a number of committees have to do with matters that concern revenues, as, for instance, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the Committee on the Public Lands, the Committee on Immigration, and various other committees of the House.

WHAT IS WRONG WITH OUR SYSTEM?

Now, what is wrong with our system? From the foregoing and from our experience I think we are all agreed that our system is wrong. I have no doubt that to-day the officers of the Government are held to a far stricter accountability than ever before and that a much smaller proportion of public funds is expended unworthily or is stolen from the people than was true 100 years ago.

The budget system does not seek primarily to correct the misapplication of public funds or to prevent the looting of the Treasury through means that are themselves unlawful, and there is surprisingly little of either in our Government. What it does comprehend is the establishment of a system that will prevent the waste, you might say, of public moneys.

Our present system is wrong because there is an immense amount of duplication of work. There is a Public Health Service in the Treasury Department, there is another under the Secretary of War, and still another one under the Navy Department, and there may be others under the various other departments. The Treasury Department has something to do through its bureaus with the field of chemistry, so has the Interior Department, and so has the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, and possibly other departments of the Government. And so I could continue. The overlapping of work is one of the main reasons for the establishment of a budget system. The departments are jealous of each other. There is rarely a department, I have discovered, that once it has laid its hands on a particular line of work willingly surrenders it or willingly or at all admits that it can not handle the work more orderly and more properly than any other department. I could multiply incidents and illustrations of what I mean by the hour, and so could you all, to illustrate this point and to illustrate the jealousy that exists among the departments in the handling of their work.

Now, what system shall we adopt? There are some writers and speakers on this question who urge the British system or the French system, and with full confidence that the budget problem is one that can be worked out by the taking over of some system tried out in some other country and applying it in our own without regard to structure of government, ideals of the people, and numerous other considerations.

BUDGET SYSTEM OF GREAT BRITAIN.

In Great Britain we have a monarchy; we have an executive department and a legislative department. The executive power in Great Britain is nominally in the Crown, but we know that as a matter of fact the power is vested in what is called the ministry, which is made up for the most part from the legislative body itself; that is, the Parliament.

This ministry is named from the majority party or group of the Parliament.

The budget is prepared by the cabinet, and in its preparation three officers are relied upon for the general estimates touching the expenditures in all departments. The chancellor of the exchequer prepares the estimates for civil departments, while the estimates for the army and the navy are prepared, respectively, by the secretary of state for war and by the first lord of the admiralty. Probably I should say that new items and increases of items in the war and navy departments must be referred to the chancellor of the exchequer for his approval. If the items are for matters that are of technical or professional character the approval of the chancellor of the exchequer is formal.

Each of these departments has a corps of trained experts, whose work is to give shape to the details of the budget, for notwithstanding the fact that the broad lines of the budget must be worked out by the heads of the departments, the splitting up of the amounts to be expended must be intrusted to specialists.

From the foregoing it appears that the treasury is the responsible budget office in Great Britain. In this office is a highly organized and permanent budget staff immediately responsible to the financial secretary of the treasury, who is himself a member of the ministry. To the treasury all the civil departments annually submit their estimates of expenditure for the coming fiscal year. These estimates are used as the working basis by the treasury staff, and the latter is vested with the responsibility of inquiring into estimates and modifying them, submitting to the ministerial officers of the department the problems of large significance. Thus the treasury staff, under the direction of the chancellor of the exchequer and the financial secretary of the treasury, prepare the budget of Great Britain for all the civil departments of the Government. Under the direction, likewise, of the chancellor of the exchequer there is annually prepared an estimate of the receipts of the Government for the approaching fiscal year; and if the estimated receipts are less than the estimated revenues this officer prepares plans of taxation to raise the additional required amount of revenue.

So, then, the budget is submitted to Parliament in three parts—one part for the army, by the secretary of state for war; one for the navy, by the first lord of the admiralty; and one for all the civil departments, by the chancellor of the exchequer; and likewise this latter officer submits proposed plans of taxation.

The budget as it is finally worked out must be in such shape as to have the approval of the ministry and it is presented to the Parliament with all the authority of the ministry and the responsibility is assumed by the ministry for what it contains. Now, there is no standing committee in the House of Commons, but the budget is presented immediately to that institution in Great Britain that we have copied for our own Congress—the Committee of the Whole. The reason why it is not presented to one or more committees of the House of Commons is because the ministry is itself, for the most part, made up of members of that body, and therefore is practically itself a committee of the British Parliament. Furthermore, and important in connection with this system of budget making, there is no veto power in Great Britain, and in addition the House of Lords may not amend the budget or financial bills. Can anyone, then, apply the British system to the United States? Those who urge that system and attempt to make application, urge that we should rely with almost blind simplicity and confidence upon the Cabinet or the President for the budget, because the ministry is so relied on in Great Britain.

The Cabinet in the United States is not part of the legislative body, but is a separate and distinct institution responsible in an immediate way to the President, not to Congress. In Great Britain the ministry is practically a committee selected from Parliament. Bear in mind again that in Great Britain, if a great policy, such as might be involved in a budget, shall be presented by the ministry and shall be rejected by the Parliament, the ministry does one of two things—it resigns, that a new ministry may be invited by the King to assume control, or it goes before the country, calling an election and asking to be justified or turned down.

Is that the policy in the United States? Did you ever hear of a President and his Cabinet resigning when the Congress turned down a policy recommended by the President and his Cabinet? Did you ever hear of a President and his Cabinet urging a special vote of confidence or resigning so that vacancy would be created and an election be held? Not at all. On the other hand, the President and his Cabinet are intrusted with executive responsibility for a period of four years, and the very arbitrary and independent character of the Executive, together with the fact that the Executive has the veto power, places this branch of the Government upon such a different basis from that which obtains in Great Britain that there can be no sensible analogy drawn between a budget system that would work in Great Britain and one that would be satisfactory in the United States.

FRENCH BUDGET SYSTEM.

And as for France, the situation there is analogous rather to Great Britain than to the United States. The President is elected by the two legislative bodies in joint session for a period of seven years. The senators are elected indirectly for a period of nine years. The deputies are elected by direct vote for a period of four years. The cabinet is named by the President, and while there may be some members chosen from the outside, for the most part the members of the cabinet are selected from the Senate and Chamber of Deputies. Finance matters may originate only in the Chamber of Deputies and not in the Senate. The budget is prepared under the direction of the minister of finance by a budget committee, and is supposed to represent the idea of the cabinet touching expenditures and revenues.

The budget is submitted to the Chamber of Deputies in the form of a bill, and by that body is immediately referred to the budget committee made up of 44 members of the chamber. The budget committee has full power in the matter of increasing, reducing, or eliminating items of the bill or adding new items. The budget committee reports the measure to the chamber and the powers of the chamber are limited. No new item may be offered, and no items may be increased if they pertain to salaries, compensations, or pensions. Furthermore, all other amendments must be offered in the early stages of procedure of consideration of the measure. The ministers may, of course, participate in the debate, and may offer amendments within limitations to supplement the original estimates. If the bill passes the chamber it goes to the Senate, and by that body is referred to a committee of 27 of its own membership, called the finance committee. This committee reports the bill, with any permissible amendments, to the Senate, but neither the committee nor members of the Senate may propose any amendments other than to strike out or reduce items, except such items as had been eliminated from the bill in the Chamber of Deputies.

As in Great Britain, the cabinet is to all practical purposes a committee of the legislative body, and if the cabinet shall be turned down and the budget bill shall fail, why, as in Great Britain, the ministry is dissolved and a new cabinet is appointed, representing what seems to be the prevailing point of view of the legislative body.

So we see that in both of these countries the executive is very largely a part of and responsible to the legislature. Now, this is not at all true in the United States, and for that reason an entirely different budget system must be worked out.

BUDGETS IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

I have examined the budget systems with some care of other countries—Switzerland, Japan, Germany under the Empire, Canada, and Australia. They are all interesting and made to meet the peculiar structure of government with the varying balancing of power between the executive and the legislative branches. In Germany under the Empire too much authority was vested in the Emperor. And this is true in Japan, where no bill perthining to finances may be introduced into the Diet that has not first had the approval of the Crown. In Canada, Australia, and Switzerland the budget system is more analogous to that of Great Britain, for the executive department is wholly or largely dependent upon legislative will.

LEGISLATIVE BUDGET.

It has been suggested that the legislative branch of our Government should be the branch to prepare the budget, since it controls the purse strings and since it is responsible immediately to the people.

The criticism that I make against that idea is that the legislative branch of the Government can not know the details of the wants of the various departments and bureaus of the Government. It can not know the relative value of the various functions of the Government. To provide such a system would be to reverse the orderly manner of procedure.

The administration is in position to know what each particular branch is doing, to have an idea of the importance of the work, and to assemble under one head or in one group the items of expenditure that it is willing to go to Congress and ask be taken care of.

The legislative branch of the Government has its function not in initially preparing the budget but in discussing it, in giving publicity to the various items suggested, in criticizing, if you please, in subtracting and adding to, and helping the administration to a better knowledge of the attitude of the public toward the facts and toward agencies of the Government.

EXECUTIVE BUDGET.

There are some who say, "Let us have an executive budget." These persons have in mind, or think they have in mind, the budget system of Great Britain or France. As a matter of fact, as I have indicated, the executive in those two countries is wrapped up and identified with the legislative body. Those who would urge an executive system upon the United States with our executive department a separate and distinct department of government, with the tenure of office fixed at four years, with the Executive not subject to recall the moment his policy might be turned down by the Congress—those who urge this system have read history to small purpose. They have not been impressed with the struggle that for several hundred years went on in England, from which country we borrowed very largely our system of government—the struggle, I say, to wrest from the Crown the right of the people to have a part in taxation. These people have read to little purpose not only the struggle in Great Britain but the struggle that went on in the colonies before our separation from the mother country by asserting the right of representation if taxation were to be imposed. They have read to little purpose the history of the debates that centered around the formation of our Government when we drafted a Constitution that separated the executive from the legislative; that gave to the Congress the purse strings; that provided that bills for the raising of revenue should originate in the House; and that placed upon the Executive the responsibility of administering and carrying out the policy that the representatives of the people themselves had outlined. Those who urge the executive budget forget, too, as they point to Great Britain and to France, that our President and his Cabinet will not resign, and are not expected to resign, upon the Congress turning down a policy recommended by the administration.

BUDGET SYSTEM FOR THE UNITED STATES.

From what I have said touching the system of the budget in Great Britain and in France, it must be apparent that a similar system would not be at all appropriate in the United States. In the United States the executive and legislative branches of the Government are separate and distinct. It would seem, however, that the budget in its preparation, in the first instance, should be the work of the executive branch of the Government. The legislative branch can not know the details of the various executive departments, and it would seem that an orderly way to proceed would be for some institution to be established under whatever name—bureau, commission, or what not—that would have the responsibility of gathering in the facts from all the departments, commissions, bureaus, or other agencies of the Government, touching expenses for the coming year, and also that would have the responsibility of gathering in the facts touching the prospective revenues for the same period. This agency should be separate and apart from any Cabinet office. It should be an independent institution or bureau responsible only to the President. It should have the power to go carefully into the affairs of all the departments and bureaus of the Government, ascertain and know the needs and wants of such departments and bureaus, ascertain whether or not there is overlapping of work or duplication of work that could be eliminated, and whether or not work that is being done in several departments could not be combined under one. Also there should be provided another institution that would have charge of the auditing of all the accounts of the several departments and bureaus, and there should be further intrusted with this institution power and responsibility of inquiring into expenses, of checking up on efficiency, of even calling a halt on expenditure until the President himself may be advised. It should be the function of the budget bureau or commission to submit to the President all the facts touching on the prospective needs of the various departments, bureaus, and commissions and the expenditures that will be necessary during the coming year, and as well laying before the President facts touching the revenues for the same period. It should then be the duty of the President to submit to Congress such a budget as he is willing to stand for and as to which he is willing to have his administration responsible. It would seem advisable that there should be submitted to Congress at the same time by the President an alternative budget that would indicate the vital needs of the country and that would eliminate expenditures for the maintenance of institutions or the carrying on of functions that can well be carried on, but that in case of necessity could with least difficulty and embarrassment be avoided.

The budget, then, as initially prepared, should represent the wishes of the administration. Now, it happens that sometimes unusual conditions make it necessary for unusual expense to be incurred. The President should then have the power to submit supplementary estimates or statements calling for further funds and indicating the reasons therefor. Likewise, new legislation sometimes provides for expenditure of money, and, after the President may ascertain what the expenses may be, he should have the power to make new statements to the Congress that in a way would supplement the budget.

With these ideas in view, the Good bill has been prepared, and I shall briefly outline what it does.

THE PENDING BILL.

First. It creates a bureau of the budget.

(a) This bureau is responsible to the President.

(b) All departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, offices, agencies, or other establishments of the Government, except the legislative branch and the Supreme Court, shall furnish annually to the President estimates of cost of their maintenance for the succeeding year.

(c) The bureau of the budget shall assist the President in working out a budget for the executive branch of the Government.

(d) The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit to the President his estimate of public revenues for the coming year and the condition of the Treasury.

Second. The President shall transmit to Congress on the first day of each regular session a document called a budget, which shall contain balanced statements of the revenues and expenditures of the Government for the preceding fiscal year and of the resources and liabilities of the Treasury at the close of the year, his estimate of the revenues and expenditures of the Government for the current fiscal year and of the resources and liabilities of the Treasury at the close of the year, his estimates of the revenue and expenditure needs of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year, and how, in his opinion, these needs should be met. The estimates of expenditures for the legislative branch of the Government and the Supreme Court shall be those submitted to the President. The President shall transmit with such budget such further data regarding the financial affairs of the Government and such recommendations in relation thereto as he deems proper.

Third. The President shall transmit an alternative budget.

Fourth. No estimate or request for appropriation or recommendation for raising revenue shall be made by an executive officer of the Government to the Congress except through the President, unless at the request of either House of Congress.

Fifth. Special additional estimates may be made.

(a) To meet conditions under new laws.

(b) To supplement prior estimates.

Sixth. An accounting department is created.

(a) Independent of executive department.

(b) Under control and direction of comptroller general of the United States.

(c) Comptroller appointed by President, confirmed by Senate.

(d) Services for good behavior.

(e) Takes place of six auditing offices under present law, and the latter are abolished.

(f) Duties of accounting department defined.

I shall take but a few words further to note a few ways the budget and accounting system should react on our governmental financial affairs.

LUMP SUM AND ITEMIZED APPROPRIATIONS.

When Congress appropriates a sum of money without itemizing the use to which the money is to be applied, we call it a lump-sum appropriation. Discretion is then left with the executive officer to administer the fund. If all administrative officers would act in good faith, this would be the best kind of appropriation to make within broadly definite bounds, for the money could be made to go further and purchase more of service than when itemized lists are attached indicating that for which the money shall be applied. Ordinary business economies could be practiced in purchasing supplies and in employing help. Employees could be readily shifted from one department to another as work was heavy or light. An $1,800 clerk could alternate between two offices and handle the work admirably under a lump-sum arrangement, while under an itemized arrangement two clerks at $1,800 each would be employed oftentimes and each do about half work.

And so in other ways that a business man would devise.

But experience has shown that the lump-sum system will not be faithfully executed by all heads of bureaus. Favoritism is shown; unequal and even widely different compensation for the same work is paid; ambitious heads of divisions overreach in extending the activities under them beyond all bounds; these and other evils make dissatisfaction among employees and among division heads. In spite of economies that are disclosed under faithful heads of divisions, the extravagances and overreaching ambitions of unfaithful heads neutralize all good and produce an exceedingly large balance of wrong. To correct these wrongs and protect the public, Congress has been compelled to itemize in large degree the matters for which funds shall be spent.

Now, it would seem that under the budget system, coupled, as it is, with an independent audit system, the lump-sum appropriations idea could be somewhat extended, the good being attained and the evils eliminated. The comptroller general would be the first to discover abuses, and the budget bureau would have a second check.

WOULD PREVENT OTHER ADMINISTRATIVE ABUSES.

But the budget and audit plan would prevent still other abuses. The administration would constantly have its attention called to inefficiency. The inefficiency that results from infirmities of employees and the humanity of bureau heads in refusing to discharge those who have seen long service and are no longer able to render anywhere near a dollar's worth for a dollar paid, I trust will be corrected by civil-service retirement legislation.

But there is another class of inefficiency that the budget and audit system should reach. I have not the slightest doubt that Members of Congress are able to obtain and do obtain better and more efficient secretaries and clerks than they could possibly obtain through the civil service for the same compensation, and why? Because they are able to pick and choose and retain the efficient and dismiss the dull. But in assembling many thousands of clerks and other employees, as must be done in the departments, we must have civil service, with all its faults, to prevent still greater wrongs. Under it the large majority of employees are thoroughly high class, but not all. Inefficient employees, like clinkers in a furnace, hamper the work. They are in all departments, killing time, disturbing public business, writing answers to letters that do not answer, stupidly pretending to do work that live employees must do over again or waste their good time coaching the dullards. To get rid of the worthless when once installed is the bane of department heads. We all know of clerks who are shunted from division to division, department to department, because they can not make good, and chiefs very kindly help them to a transfer rather than make a fight to dismiss them entirely. "Let George do it" is the motto as these Government failures are passed on for another chief to dispose of. I am told that it is almost impossible to get rid of worthless help when once installed.

Surely the budget and audit system will go far to correct this situation, and to rid the pay roll of this type. Faithful and competent employees will welcome the prospect and the Public Treasury will be the gainer by the change.

HORIZONTAL CUTS.

Another thing to be hoped for is the more scientific scaling down of amounts asked for as occasion demands. Just as an individual, our Government should keep within its income. If the ready estimates of expenditures total $1,500,000,000 and the estimated revenues equal only $1,000,000,000, clearly the budget must be reduced or new taxes must be laid. One way to reduce the budget would be to clip one-third off every item in the estimates. But this will not do, for some items can better be eliminated entirely rather than suffer other items to be reduced a penny. Just as in a private home, the father may give over buying an automobile, but he can not give over medical attention for his child. The Congress tries to discriminate under the present system, but under the budget plan proposed the administration would be asked to discriminate and to indicate to Congress the items of most vital concern.

ALTERNATIVE BUDGET.

This leads me to notice one of the most vital features of the bill, the section that provides for an alternative budget. Every department should be asked to advise the President, and thereby the budget bureau, what items are vital and should be maintained should the occasion arise for reducing the budget 20 per cent, 50 per cent, or more. Then the budget bureau, having the advice of the respective department heads, could make further analysis for the benefit of the President, and the President would come before Congress with a definite program. The President would say, "Here is an outline of my idea of how the Government can best spend a billion and a half of dollars, and here is an outline of the way the Government should spend the money if only a billion dollars shall be available." The Congress would then take the estimates and bring its judgment to bear upon them.

All in all, the adoption of the budget and audit system, as is provided in the pending bill, will go far toward establishing a more businesslike administration of public affairs. Under this system the administration will be responsible for the budget as proposed, the Congress responsible for the budget as passed. Under this system duplication of work in departments would be eliminated or a satisfactory reason be established wherever it continued. Under this system inefficiency would be disclosed. Under this system there would constantly be held up to Congress and to the country a picture of that for which the people's money is expended. Under this system the issue could always be made whether or not any particular function of Government should be carried on or be abolished.

Every dollar that we spend comes from the people. The man of wealth may pay millions, and the poorest citizen of our land, whose hands are horny with toil, contributes his share when he purchases so much as a postage stamp. Both alike want good government; they want order, security, conveniences that organized society affords, and they are willing to pay the cost. And, again, both alike ask that in the expenditure of their money a hundred cents' worth of service be bought for every dollar paid.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER. On what subject?

Mr. KELLER. On this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to the following:

To Mr. THOMAS, for an indefinite period.

To Mr. DRANE, on account of important official business.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 9203. An act to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce; and

H. R. 1429. An act adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho.

EARTHQUAKE IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a report regarding the earthquake investigation made by Dr. Reed and Prof. Taber in the island of Porto Rico. This report was made under the direction of the Secretary of War, and it is requested that it be printed as a public document, it being of considerable scientific interest and value.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the matter indicated be printed as a public document. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Can the gentleman state what prevents the War Department from printing this?

Mr. TOWNER. I could not say. It is usual. I think there is no question but this is the usual way in which these scientific investigations have been made. The earthquake, as the gentleman knows, in Porto Rico was quite a serious one. Such a one had never occurred before on the island. It is of considerable interest to scientific men.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman knows that the War Department has a fund out of which it could publish this document, if it desired to do so.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know anything about that, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. They have a fund out of which they can publish such documents as they think are necessary. Does the gentleman know how much it will cost?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. I have an estimate here of what it would cost.

Mr. MASON. It would not cost any more here than there, would it?

Mr. SEARS. Would it stop the earthquakes?

Mr. TOWNER. The statement is that it will require a little over $300, I will say to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, October 18, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

PROMOTION OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in response to Senate resolution 203, which will be inserted in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 16, 1919.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

SIR: Responding to Senate resolution 203, requesting detailed statements of the character, amount, and estimate of the cost to the Government of the work of the International High Commission, together with such suggestions and recommendations as I may be able to make looking to the closer cooperation and coordination of the work of the commission with that of other agencies of the Government for the effective promotion of the foreign commerce of the United States, I beg to submit the following:

The International High Commission was established to give effect to the recommendations of the first Pan American financial conference, held in Washington May 23 to 29, 1915, under authorization of the Congress, given in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation act approved March 4, 1915. The conference had been called in order that the ministers of finance and appropriate financial and commercial leaders of the American Republics might take counsel with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States as to the best means of offsetting the damage done to inter-American commerce by the European War and of establishing closer commercial and financial relations between the several Republics. It was clearly obvious to those who took part in the conference that intermittent gatherings of any kind could not hope to accomplish as much along either of the lines indicated as a body permanently constituted and provided with an adequate procedure and an effective organization for frequent consultation on nontechnical matters requiring international cooperation. The structure suggested for such a body by the first Pan American financial conference met with the unanimous approval of the Governments invited to participate, and the Congress of the United States likewise sanctioned its establishment by public act No. 15, Sixty-fourth Congress, approved February 7, 1916; appended herewith. (Exhibit A.) The plan agreed upon called for a series of national sections, each composed of eminent jurists and financiers, operating under the chairmanship of the minister of finance. Each section was to have its own secretariat and to meet in separate session as often as the minister of finance would deem desirable. All the sections were to gather at such time and place and under such circumstances as the majority would determine. In fact, they did meet in Buenos Aires in April, 1916, under the chairmanship of the minister of finance of Argentina and devised a detailed program for their future work. They constituted as the directive and coordinating body of the entire commission three officers of the United States section, giving to this agency the name of central executive council. The United States section of the commission is at present composed of the following members, the first three of whom constitute the executive council:

Carter Glass, Secretary of the Treasury, chairman; John Bassett Moore, New York, vice chairman; L. S. Rowe, secretary general; John H. Fahey, Boston; Duncan U. Fletcher, United States Senator; Andrew J. Peters, mayor of Boston.

Samuel Untermyer, New York.

Paul M. Warburg, New York.

Dean John H. Wigmore, Northwestern University Law School, Chicago.

Herbert Fleishhacker, San Francisco.

The aims and objects of the commission since its meeting at Buenos Aires in 1916 have been, in a broad way, to give effect to the recommendations of the financial conference of 1915. It has taken a leading part in making effective the purposes of the International Trade-mark Convention of 1910, and has secured the establishment of the Trade-mark Registration Bureau at Habana. Upon the practical importance of that bureau in protecting the industrial property and good will of our manufacturers and exporters I need not dwell. The commission is not relaxing its efforts to bring into the trade-mark registration plan those of the seven countries which have not yet ratified the trade-mark convention, and we are confident that at a relatively early date the more important countries will have adhered.

The stabilizing of exchange and the avoidance of the risk and expense of the constant shipment of gold were the purpose of a convention providing for an international gold clearance fund, a copy of which is attached as Exhibit B. This convention has been found acceptable in principle by a number of Governments and is in process of negotiation.

For many years past the heavy license fees required of commercial travelers by municipalities and provincial governments have been a serious obstacle to international commerce. At the first Pan American Financial Conference a convention was agreed upon the purpose of which was to eliminate the excessive levying of such license fees. This convention has been found acceptable by some 14 American Republics, a number of which have signed it, and with two of which it is now actually in effect. A copy thereof, together with memoranda explaining its purpose, will be found in Exhibit C.

The commission has undertaken to study the difficult problem of uniform statistical methods, and upon the recommendation of the Department of Commerce and other competent authorities in this field the United States section recommended the adoption of the international classification of merchandise for statistical purposes agreed upon at the International Congress of Statistics, at Brussels, in November, 1913. This simple schedule has been found acceptable by various Governments as at least constituting an approach toward uniform statistical methods. The council is now publishing in the Spanish language year by year the statistics of importation and exportation of the several Republics as furnished to its secretary general by the national sections. The Department of Commerce is publishing the English version of the figures for the United States. All values are given in the national currency of the country concerned and in a money of account upon which agreement was reached by the commission, taking one-fifth of the United States gold dollar as the unit. To this money of account the name Panamericano was given.

Close to the heart of the entire problem of progressive and uniform international and commercial law are the related problems of bills of exchange, checks, and other negotiable instruments. The commission early decided that The Hague rules on bills of exchange and on checks were much closer to the commercial law of the countries of civil-law tradtions than could be the uniform negotiable instruments act of the United States. To reduce the slightly divergent systems of the various Republics to one harmonious standard set up beside the negotiable instruments act would at least constitute a genuine service and simplification of the problem. To this end the commission has devoted itself, and it is gratifying to be able to report that no less than five national congresses have at this time projects of law modifying their commercial codes with reference to bills of exchange in the direction proposed by The Hague conferences on that subject, while one country has lately enacted The Hague rules on checks in slightly modified form. To warehouse receipts and bills of lading the commission has given somewhat less attention, and urges the adoption of the respective United States uniform acts. With the problems of acceptances and conditional sales the commission is likewise concerned, and hopes to be able to recommend specific programs to the several Governments before much time shall have elapsed.

Without citing the other activities of the commission, but submitting instead a list of references in regard to its work (Exhibit D), I beg to urge upon the Senate the consideration that the commission provides a direct and uninterrupted agency for the exchange of ideas on technical and nondiplomatic problems. The simplicity as well as the elasticity of the organization of the International High Commission makes it possible for it to secure important results with a surprisingly small outlay, and I have no suggestions to offer as to further cooperation and coordination.

So far as concerns the appropriations made by the Congress of the United States I append (Exhibit E) a list of them, together with indications of the manner in which they were expended and an estimate of expenditures during the fiscal year 1920–21 to be made from the appropriation of $30,000 for the maintenance of the commission, concerning which I shall make a recommendation in my annual report to be submitted to the Congress in December.

Closely related to the work of the commission and indeed absorbing the attention of all its sections at the present time is the second gathering of ministers of finance and representative commercial and financial leaders of the American Republics at Washington, January 12 to 17, 1920. Just as the first Pan American Financial Conference had largely an emergency purpose and was concerned with remedial measures, so the second Pan American Financial Conference will be concerned with reconstruction and with the establishment upon a broad basis of the best possible commercial and financial relations between the free Republics of this hemisphere. An appropriation to defray the expense of this conference was made by the Sixty-fourth Congress in Public Act No. 379, which provided $50,000 to remain available until expended. To this conference it is expected that nearly all the ministers of finance will come, and a number of representatives of our own industrial and financial communities will be invited to join in discussing the problems of common interest and moment. The International High Commission will submit a detailed report of its activities to this conference.

I have the honor, sir, to remain,
Respectfully,
CARTER GLASS, Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by W. H. Overhue, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a resolution from District No. 17, United Mine Workers of America, of Charleston, W. Va., praying for a Federal investigation into conditions in the Guyan River field, West Virginia, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fall River, Kans., praying for aid from the United States in relieving conditions in Armenia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present for reading copies of two telegrams—one issued by the Finance Committee of the League to Enforce Peace, being a telegram sent to one of the leading manufacturers of the State of Michigan, and a copy of that manufacturer's answer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., October 15.

CHAS. E. KOLB,
31 Garrison:

In this moral and political crisis League to Enforce Peace, William Howard Taft, president, A. Lawrence Lowell, chairman, has great and necessary responsibility of leading and securing expression of public demand for prompt ratification of the peace treaty and league of nations covenant without amendments and without reservations that would require resubmission of Paris conference or separate peace with Germany. Business uncertainty and industrial unrest will continue throughout the world until ratification starts life again in normal channels. Will you join others in contributing $500 toward expenses of campaign?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask for the printing in the RECORD of an article on the amendment which is known as the Johnson amendment to the treaty appearing in a Michigan newspaper, written by Benton Hanchett, one of the leading attorneys of the United States, a man whose reputation stands especially high wherever he is known.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GREAT BRITAIN'S SIX AND UNITED STATES' ONE VOTE IN LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

EDITOR THE NEWS COURIER:

The provisions of the league of nations by which in the working of the league Great Britain is to have six votes while the United States is to have only one vote are a matter of interest and of division among those who support the league without change of its terms, and those who support the league with a change or with reservations respecting some of its terms. President Wilson upon his speaking tour first met the objection of the inequality of the voting power of Great Britain and the United States by stating that this inequality existed only in the assembly of the league, which he said was only a debating society, and that the assembly does not vote, that the voting power of the members of the league is in the council of the league, where the voting power of Great Britain and of the United States is equal, each having one vote. This explanation of the President was disputed in a speech upon the league by Senator REED, of Missouri, and following this speech of Senator REED, the President, at his address at Pueblo, Colo.—reported in the New York Sun—said: "Now, you have heard of six votes belonging to Great Britain. Those six votes are not in the council; they are in the assembly, and the interesting thing is that the assembly does not vote. I must qualify that statement a little, but essentially it is absolutely true."

The facts are these: The league provides in article 2 that the action of the league under this covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of an assembly and of a council. The assembly may deal at its meeting with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world. At meetings of the assembly each member of the league shall have one vote and may not have more than three representatives.

The original members of the league signing the league are 32 in number, among whom are Great Britain, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India, each of which has a vote in the assembly, and they make up the six votes for Great Britain. The United States has a single member, having only one vote.

Article 4 provides that "the council shall consist of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, together with four other members of the league. These four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion. * * * With the approval of the majority of the assembly the council may name additional members of the league, whose representatives shall always be members of the council; the council with like approval—approval of a majority of the assembly—may increase the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation in the council." Article 1 provides that "any of the self-governing States, dominions, or colonies not named in the annex may become members of the league if admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the assembly." By article 5, "decisions at any meetings of the assembly or of the council will require agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting except where otherwise provided." It will be observed that by the above provisions the assembly by its vote is to determine these most important matters, viz:

1. The assembly may deal with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

2. The assembly shall select from time to time, in its discretion, the four members of the council which, with representatives of the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan (those being the allied and associated powers) are to constitute the council until the number of the members of the council shall be increased.

3. By approval of the assembly expressed by a majority vote of its members, the council may name additional members of the league whose representatives may be always members of the council. By this means the number of the members of the council may be increased.

4. By approval of the assembly expressed by a majority vote of its members the council may increase the number of the members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representatives in the council. By this method also the number of the members of the council may be increased.

5. By agreement of two-thirds of the assembly expressed by its vote any State, dominion, or colony may become a member of the league in addition to the 32 members of the league which have signed the league.

In all of the above action of the assembly Great Britain will have six votes and the United States only one vote.

6. In the selection of the first four members of the council to make up the full membership of the council, which selection is to be made by the assembly from time to time, the members so selected, up to the full number of the four, may be representatives of Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India. In this manner Great Britain may obtain in the council votes up to the number of five, while the United States can in no case have more than one vote in the council.

7. As the members of the council from time to time may be increased, Great Britain may acquire in the council up to the full number of votes which it has in the assembly, by election to the council of representatives of Great Britain's above-named self-governing dominions, while the United States must remain always the possessor of its one vote in the council.

The question whether representatives of Canada and other self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be elected to the council has been answered to the inquiry made by Mr. Borden, prime minister of Canada, upon that precise subject, by the following letter of President Wilson, Lloyd-George and Clemenceau, viz:

The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraph of the article representatives of self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council, we have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view. If there were any doubt it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles are not subject to a narrow or technical construction.

G. CLEMENCEAU.
WOODROW WILSON.
D. LLOYD-GEORGE.

Here is a statement by the very men who framed the league of nations that representatives of Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India, which are the self-governing dominions of the British Empire, may be selected as members of the council. This being true, Great Britain then may have and may obtain the same number of votes in the council which it has in the assembly, viz, six for Great Britain, while the United States has one. The question here is not what will be done under the league, but what its terms provide for and what may be done under it, and it is so plain that "he who runs may read" that within the terms and provisions of the league, in both assembly and council, Great Britain may have six votes to the United States' one vote, and that thus in every matter which may come before the league Great Britain may have six times the voice and power of the United States.

Again, under article 15 of the league, Great Britain will have six votes, and the United States one vote only, in disposing of and deciding questions of the utmost importance which come before the league. By this article whenever there shall "arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture which is not submitted to arbitration, as above, the members of the league agree that they will submit it to the council. * * * The council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of any dispute. * * * The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly, and the dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute." The reference to the assembly is for the purpose of having the assembly settle the dispute. This settlement is to be accomplished by bringing to bear upon the parties to the dispute the personal influence of the members of the assembly, their arguments, their advice, their weight of character, and by the weight of the interest in the dispute which the nation has whose members take part in seeking to secure the terms by which the dispute will be settled. Suppose the dispute were between China and Japan concerning the return of Shantung to China. Is there any doubt that Japan would have the dispute referred to the assembly, depending upon and expecting to have the influence of the six voices and six votes of Great Britain on its side in securing such terms as would be acceptable to Japan, Great Britain having already by treaty with Japan committed itself to the interest of Japan in returning Shantung to China? Here may be six advocates for Great Britain laboring for Japan and one advocate of the United States advocating for China. If in any case the settlement is not arrived at by the efforts of the assembly, it then remains for the parties to the dispute to fight it out in their own way. If a settlement is made, and the making of such settlement is one of the most important powers for which the assembly is created, it will be made upon the terms arranged solely by action of the assembly. The report of the settlement is to be made by the assembly to the council and the assembly. If the report of the settlement is concurred in by the members of the council and by a majority of the members of the league the settlement will stand and the dispute be at an end (the representatives of the parties to the dispute not voting). The council and the members of the assembly upon this report of the settlement being made can not amend or change it. They have no power over it other than to approve it or disapprove it. If the members of the council disapprove of it the settlement goes for naught, and the parties are then again left to fight it out in their own way.

The precise point is this: That every such dispute may be brought before the assembly. If a settlement of it is made, that settlement and its terms are the work of the assembly alone. In the work of the settlement Great Britain perhaps speaks and argues by Lloyd-George, prime minister of England; Robert Borden, prime minister of Canada; Mr. Hughes, prime minister of Australia; Gen. Smuts, prime minister of South Africa; the prime minister of New Zealand; and India's best man, and the United States, perhaps, by Col. E. M. House.

The writer has no unfriendliness toward Great Britain or toward its self-governing dominions, but in the "matching of minds," in the making of the terms of the league of nations, he deeply feels that the United States of America has met a Waterloo defeat.

BENTON HANCHETT.

Mr. PENROSE. I present to the Senate and ask to have read the communication which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA DIVISION,
SONS OF VETERANS, U. S. A.,
Philadelphia, October 17, 1919.

Hon. BOISE PENROSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I inclose you copy of letter which speaks for itself.

Fraternally,

W. B. MCNULTY,
Division Secretary.

PENNSYLVANIA DIVISION,
SONS OF VETERANS, U. S. A.,
Philadelphia, October 16, 1919.

Mr. TOM JONES MEEK,
National Extension Building, New York City.

DEAR SIR: The Sons of Veterans, United States of America, association of Philadelphia unanimously oppose the present treaty and league of nations because we believe that our Nation is not protected, especially in our control of the Monroe doctrine and our internal questions. We decline absolutely to agree to any control of our Army and Navy by any other authority except Congress. We are in favor of peace, but not at the cost of surrendering any of our rights.

We understand that the President and Congress are in favor of a league that will end war for all time; in fact, all our people seem to agree to this proposition. The President informs the Nation that we are amply protected in every way, and that fact is so clearly understood by the other nations that it is not necessary to make amendments or reservations by which to safeguard our interests, but as soon as he is asked to have this part of the written agreement he objects because it would require, as he claims, submitting the whole contract to the nations interested and intimates that it would kill the whole proposition. His statements are contradictory and inconsistent, and we fail to understand where there can be any objection to placing in the league of nations covenant amendments and reservations in accordance with his statements. We have not heard any statement from the other nations to the effect that what the President has told the American people is correct, and strange silence seems to prevail on this matter in Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. We can not understand why there should be objections to inserting in this agreement the President's statements about our protection, especially if it is a fact that the other nations agree to the safeguards as stated by the President.

We oppose the Shantung feature of the treaty. We consider it dishonorable to agree to the giving of any part of a friendly country, especially one of our allies, to another nation. We should not sanction any secret treaty entered into by other nations to transfer from an enemy territory taken by compulsion from a friendly power, even to give it to one of our allies; it would be national dishonor to do so and a violation of the 14 points as enunciated by our President.

All the eloquence of any speaker that you could send us would be of no avail unless he could show us some better reason than the President has advanced for a refusal to place in the treaty the safeguards mentioned.

Respectfully,

W. B. MCNULTY,
Secretary Sons of Veterans Association of Philadelphia.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I merely wish to add that this organization which is called the Sons of Veterans is composed of the sons of the veterans of the Civil War. It is a very active and numerous society in Philadelphia, and is a very patriotic body, active in all patriotic movements. The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is a member of the Sons of Veterans in his State, and so is the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] a member of that organization in his State. I think that both of these Senators have been to Philadelphia and have honored this organization by being with them and addressing them on the occasion of their annual banquet.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition from certain constituents of mine in Barry, Ill., in reference to the league of nations, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BARRY, ILL., September 30, 1919.

Senator SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your constituents here, who are not biased by partisan sentiment, wish the United States Senate to guard the interests and nationality of the United States above everything else.

The Monroe doctrine must be left operable in its full strength; we must retain the right to decide our own questions on immigration, the tariff, the strength of our own Army and Navy, and all other questions affecting ourselves as a Nation.

We must be masters of our own fate as we have been in the past. We decline to place ourselves or our children in a position to be drafted by Europe to settle their everlasting embroglio of racial, political, or religious hatreds. Our fathers came here to get away from that.

Washington warned us to keep free from entangling alliances, and his words hold true to-day.

Therefore, as 100 per cent Americans, we demand continued unfettered national existence, and hereby pledge anew our undying allegiance to our own country and our own flag.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have another petition, from 300 clergymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of the Rock River conference, asking me to vote for the league of nations treaty without amendment or reservation. I decline to present such a petition. I have answered the petitioners by mail to-day, telling them that if they do not know more about the plan of salvation than they do about the league of nations their congregations need new spiritual guides.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, as somewhat offsetting what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has just said in regard to the attitude of the Methodist clergymen in his State, I send to the desk and ask to have read an editorial from the Aberdeen (S. Dak.) News, with regard to the attitude of the Methodists of South Dakota.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

METHODISTS SPEAK UP.

"The Dakota conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in session at Mitchell last week, declared in favor of amendments and reservations to the league of nations covenant, to properly safeguard the American Constitution and the Monroe doctrine. The bishops of the Episcopal Church, in session at Detroit last week, voted down a declaration in favor of the covenant in its present form, for a modified indorsement of the plan. The Mitchell Republican, published in the hostess city of the Methodist Episcopal conference, has been bitter in its attacks upon Senators favoring reservations and amendments to the covenant, and has not hesitated to accuse them of ulterior motives in their opposition. It has insisted that from 75 to 85 per cent of the people of South Dakota are in favor of the covenant as the President presented it to the Senate. The Methodist Episcopal Church is the largest religious denomination in South Dakota. The resolution concerning the pact was adopted by a conference consisting of the ministers from every charge in the State and from lay delegates elected from the membership of each charge. It was a representative body, and both the clergymen and the lay delegates are in close and intimate touch with the people all over the Commonwealth. They know what South Dakotans are thinking about. They are thoughtful, intelligent men themselves, and they have given the matter of the covenant for the league of nations, the provisions contained in the original document, and the amendments and reservations offered in the Senate considerable thought, as all genuine Americans should. And they have reached the conclusion that the covenant needs fixing before ratification."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, up to this time I have not asked that a letter or telegram be inserted in the RECORD either for or against the league of nations; but this morning I have a letter from an ex-Member of the Senate to which I desire to direct the attention of the Senate. The League to Enforce Peace has been very active in my State in requesting citizens there to telegraph to me to vote for the league of nations as it has been written, without reservation or amendment. From the letter referred to I see that the League to Enforce Peace has changed its tactics, and, instead of pleading with citizens or requesting them, are now demanding that they telegraph their Senators. The letter received by me this morning is from ex-Senator Joseph L. Rawlins, and I am going to read it into the RECORD. It is as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am this morning in receipt of an urgent telegraphic request from the League to Enforce Peace, not that I request but that I demand that you immediately vote for the league of nations. Of course, I know you to be entirely capable of forming your own judgment as to the merits of this measure and that you will act accordingly; but, as for myself and those with whom I come in contact, I wish to say for your information that we should be greatly gratified if you can bring about with your vote the defeat of this measure so detrimental, in our judgment, to the liberties and the welfare of the American people.

I presume there is not a Senator in this body but that knows who Joseph L. Rawlins is. He served six years in the Senate upon the Democratic side, and is just as loyal an American as ever lived.

I will simply add, Mr. President, that if this letter had not come from an ex-Member of this body I would not have thought of breaking the rule I have followed by asking that it be published in the RECORD in connection with the consideration of the league of nations covenant.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Utah has broken his rule, I ask to have read from the desk an editorial from the Evening Tribune, of Davenport, Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Evening Tribune.]

"SOUND IRISH SENTIMENT.

"The Evening Tribune takes pleasure in republishing the following resolution adopted by Division No. 1 of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in Davenport, because they tally so completely with its own notion of how Irish self-determination is to be brought about:

"Believing that the just demands of the Irish people for self-determination, independent government, until admitted by Europe, threatens to disturb the peace and good understanding and friendly relations between the nations and peoples of the world—with or without a league of nations—and believing that the league of nations, as proposed in the covenant and treaty submitted by President Wilson to the United States Senate, offers the best if not the only practical means of compelling England to grant to Ireland the God-given rights of independence and freedom: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we favor the league of nations as the greatest forward step for world peace, its adoption the greatest self-serving contribution of the United States to the human race for the relief of oppressed people everywhere, and the best hope for the freedom and independence of Ireland. We respectfully ask our Senators to aid in its speedy ratification.

"It is so plain, if the world is to go ahead in the old way, that the smaller peoples will more than ever be under the shadow or under the wing of their more powerful neighbors, that everybody ought to see it without argument. For their more powerful neighbors are going to be watchful of every element of weakness as never before. Not to go away from home for illustration, the United States is going to be much more watchful of its immediate neighbors if we go ahead in the old jealousies and old rivalries.

"The only hope of the smaller peoples is in an ordered world, where everybody is sworn to keep the peace and to help enforce the law. The beginning of dawn will be for them just when the world is banded together in some effective way to protect rights of life and property and to secure liberty the world over.

"The Evening Tribune would congratulate the Davenport Hibernians on seeing so clearly just where Ireland's future lies. Every American of Irish descent and every American of Irish sympathies should be for the league of nations with all the might that is in him."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a resolution with regard to the Armenian question passed by the Near East Relief Society by a unanimous vote.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas from authenticated sources comes the statement that there are at least 100,000 Christian and Jewish girls and women held captive in the harems of the Turks, Kurds, and Arabs within the domain of the former Ottoman Empire, forced to live in suffering and degredation often far worse than death; and

"Whereas the Near East Relief, chartered by act of Congress, has inaugurated rescue work for the care of the escaped victims of this tragedy and urgently invites the women of America to rise and free and protect the women of Armenia, the hope of their Nation: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the representatives and guests of the Near East Relief in convention assembled in New York this 15th day of October, 1919, That our Government, as the servant of humanity, be requested to take such measures as will give immediate protection to American relief workers and American property and to the stricken people whatever temporary protection is necessary until such time as they can themselves protect their womanhood and home and establish themselves among the free peoples of the earth."

SUGAR SHORTAGE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, on an entirely different subject, but a very practical and important subject to all of the people, I wish to tender a communication from a firm of wholesale dealers in groceries, produce, meats, and so forth, a very responsible firm of Jacksonville, Fla., C. W. Zaring & Co., rather in the nature of a petition. It begins by saying:

We are out of sugar in this market and can not get it—

And then proceeds to make some suggestions. I ask to have the communication printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., October 16, 1919.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are out of sugar in this market and can not get it. The Louisiana people will not name a price for shipment next month, when their sugar is ready, and intimate that the price for the cheaper grade of sugar will run 13 to 14 cents per pound f. o. b. shipping point, or approximately 4½ to 5 cents more than we have been paying for the good eastern granulated sugar.

Why is it that people who will take such an advantage can not be regulated? We think Congress should take immediate action and place Louisiana under the Equalization Board, extending the time and powers of this board. Immediate action should be taken or these people will obtain any price that they see fit to ask for their sugar. We notice the beet-sugar people are putting refined beet sugar on the market at 10½ cents, and Louisiana should not be allowed any more than that for their refined sugar, with the proper differentials for the lower grade.

Can not you get immediate action on this?

Yours, very truly,

C. W. ZARING & Co.,
C. W. ZARING, President.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have some resolutions from the woman's committee for the league of nations and other citizens of Reno, Nev., signed by the chairman and members of the committee. I ask to have them read, omitting the signatures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the resolutions.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to have the signatures printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The resolutions, together with the signatures, are as follows:

"Believing that the United States should enter the league of nations, which aims to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security;

"Recognizing that the covenant of the league of nations can not be separated from the peace treaty, since the latter was founded on the assumption that the league of nations would be formed;

"Believing that delay on the part of the United States Senate to ratify the peace treaty will seriously jeopardize the peace of the world:

"We, the woman's committee for the league of nations, and other citizens of Reno, Nev., do most earnestly urge the United States Senate to ratify the treaty of peace, including the covenant, without reservation or amendment, as soon as it is submitted for ratification.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I simply wish to suggest, if this experience meeting is over, that we proceed with the regular order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Some Senators have had the pleasure of having their experiences, but I should like the courtesy of a brief minute of experience.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw the suggestion, Mr. President. I supposed the meeting was over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, every morning there is a battle of telegrams here pro and con.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They become a part of the morning business by custom.

THE SYRIAN MANDATE.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Inasmuch as the Senator in the management of the treaty has just had an article read from the desk, I send to the desk a copy of the London Daily News of September 5, which gives just a squint at the kaleidoscopic situation existing in Asia Minor. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the order of business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of petitions and memorials, and, for a number of weeks past, letters, telegrams, editorials, newspaper clippings, and so forth.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut asks for the reading of the article referred to by him. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"The Syrian problem, after degenerating into one of the few jests of the peace conference, is now playing a more serious and sinister part. The press of the capital is no infallible guide to the trend of French opinion generally, but enough has been written in the last week by responsible papers in Paris to make it clear that what is happening in Syria is creating the possibility of serious friction between this country and France. The position with regard to Syria is simple. Under the relevant clauses of an agreement signed by Sir Edward Grey and M. Cambon in 1916 the Turkish provinces in Asia were to be so divided as to give France the Syrian seaboard, with Lesser Armenia and the Vilayet of Adana, while Great Britain acquired Lower Mesopotamia and certain rights over Haifa and Jaffa. The intervening territory was to consist of independent Arab States; Palestine becoming a protectorate under the joint suzerainty of Russia, France, and Great Britain. The complaint of France is that Great Britain, not content with securing the mandate for Mesopotamia and establishing herself in a predominant position in the new Arabian State ruled over by the King of the Hedjaz, is insisting on occupying Syria with her own troops and denying the justice of the French claim to a mandate over that region. That statement needs elaboration to cover the full facts, but as an explanation of the present discontent it is adequate.

"On that discontent there are two observations to be made. One is that it unquestionably exists, and the other that it ought not to be allowed to exist. France is laboring under a sense of grievance which can not be dismissed as entirely unjust. For the 1916 secret agreement there is nothing to be said. Under article 20 of the covenant of the league of nations, which both France and Great Britain have signed, is must plainly be abrogated. But, agreement or no agreement, this country has come singularly well out of the war in the East. We have become mandatories of one of the richest territories in the world—Mesopotamia. We have declared a protectorate over Egypt, and succeeded in warding off all suggestions of our becoming mandatories instead of suzerains of that country. We have established ourselves behind the back of the league of nations in a position of exclusive privilege in Persia. We have taken the credit and are reaping the advantages of the creation of the Kingdom of the Hedjaz and allowed the Emir Feisul to be walked round Paris by a British officer with the maximum of political indiscretion. In view of the traditional interest of France in Syria, it is not astonshing that our reluctance to recognize her claim to a Syrian mandate has provoked some warmth both of feeling and expression.

"The real difficulty of the situation lies not on the surface but far below it. The whole position of the mandate question is eminently unsatisfactory. Mandates are being apportioned by the allied delegates at Paris without any reference to the league of nations or any pretense of consulting the peoples concerned as to their choice of their new masters. As long ago as 1917 Mr. Lloyd-George said even of the German colonies in Africa that 'when you come to settle who shall be the trustees of these uncivilized lands you must take into account the sentiments of the people themselves.' If that admirable principle is to be applied to native Africans, it is much more applicable to the former subjects of the Turkish Empire in Asia. However that may be, it is our business to put ourselves right with France over Syria by declaring unequivocally and publicly that we have no intention of adding to our own responsibilities in that region and no thought of putting any impediment in the way of the grant of a Syrian mandate to France, provided that solution is agreeable to the population itself."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it appears from that article that the British press is boasting and gloating over the position in which Great Britain has established herself. I read in the Washington Post of this morning an article, which I have not at my desk, giving the speech of some noted British statesman, in which he expressed the view that it was our plain duty to help out the poor Turks, now that the Turkish Empire was in a bad way, and that we ought to go to their rescue. On this side of the ocean we are being besieged with petitions to go to the rescue of the Armenians and save them from the poor Turks, whom the British want us to protect. Between the Armenians and the Turks and the other friends of freedom in Asia Minor and elsewhere, I think we have all we can do if we can only find out which sect of these tribes we are to be the guardians of; but we are given no information upon that point as yet, and I suppose it is comparatively immaterial.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ask that Senate resolution 215 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 215, submitted yesterday by Mr. WALSH of Montana, as follows:

Whereas by the treaty between Germany on the one side and the allied and associated powers on the other, signed at Versailles the 28th day of June, A. D. 1919, it is provided that the same will come into force between the powers ratifying the same upon the deposit of ratifications by Germany and three of the said allied and associated powers; and

Whereas the said treaty has now been ratified by Germany and by three of the said powers, to wit, France, Great Britain, and Italy, and will be in effect between the said powers and the other signatories to the said treaty that have ratified the same upon the formal issuance of the procès-verbal reciting the ratifications aforesaid; and

Whereas by virtue of the said treaty the league of nations will thereupon come into being and be authorized to entertain representations in accordance with article 11 of the covenant for the league of nations, as follows:

"It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb either international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends"; and

Whereas the amicable relations between Great Britain and the United States are continually imperiled by controversies over the Government of Ireland: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that whenever the United States becomes a member of the said league of nations by ratification of the said treaty or otherwise, the Government of the United States should present to the council or the assembly of the league the state of affairs in Ireland and the right of its people to self-government.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it the intention of the Senator from Montana to press the resolution this morning?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is my intention.

Mr. THOMAS. It is a very important matter, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I ask for the reading again of so much of the resolution as asks for action by the Senate, namely, the last paragraph of the preamble and the resolution itself.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas the amicable relations between Great Britain and the United States are continually imperiled by controversies over the government of Ireland: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that whenever the United States becomes a member of the said league of nations by ratification of the said treaty or otherwise, the Government of the United States should present to the council or the assembly of the league the state of affairs in Ireland and the right of its people to self-government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the resolution recites article 11 of the covenant of the league of nations, which is the foundation for the action which the resolution contemplates shall be taken. That article reads as follows, in part:

It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

It will be recalled that while the peace conference was in session a great assemblage of citizens of this country met at the city of Philadelphia, and as a result of that meeting a deputation was sent to Versailles seeking an opportunity itself to be heard in behalf of the cause of Irish independence or seeking to secure a hearing for the representatives of the embryonic Irish republic. The view was taken apparently that only nations having established governments, recognized by the various governments of the world, were entitled to be heard by their representatives at that gathering, but provision was made in the covenant for the league of nations for a hearing for peoples claiming the right of self-government. Prominent among these people of the earth, and perhaps most conspicuous among all of them, are the people of Ireland. I have seized the first opportunity to present this method of securing a hearing for the people of Ireland in their struggle for self-government.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to answer, if I can.

Mr. PENROSE. Would not the cause of Ireland have a much better chance if the United States had six delegates instead of one in the conference?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think so.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator think Ireland stands a better show with Great Britain having six votes and the United States one?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, that is entirely aside from the matter to which I am addressing myself; but I have no objection whatever to being diverted for a moment to say to the Senator that in a matter of this character no action by the council will result. It is simply affording a forum before which the cause of Ireland can be presented, but if there were a vote it would make no difference whether the United States had 6 votes or 600 votes, inasmuch as, in order to secure action, there would have to be a unanimous vote.

Mr. PENROSE. But there would be a certain consolation in having six votes anyway.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have answered the question of the Senator. I do not propose to let him interject a speech into the midst of mine.

Mr. President, upon this general subject I made some remarks in the course of an address delivered before the Senate on the 28th day of July. I do not desire, nor do I intend, to take up much time of the Senate this morning in a discussion of the matter, and for brevity I read from the address then delivered, as follows:

"The sympathy of the people of this country, as stated, goes out spontaneously to every submerged nationality aspiring to an independent life. But there are abundant reasons why that sympathy is particularly keen in the case of the Irish. It is not alone that there are in this country at least 20,000,000 of Irish birth or Irish ancestry, whose desire as American citizens to preserve peace between the United States and the British Empire is forever at war with the feeling engendered by the story of the impartial historian of British misrule in Ireland and barbarous oppression of the Irish. The feeling of kinship dates back to the days of our own struggle for independence. The very fight that was being waged here culminating in the break was at the time in progress in Ireland. It had its parliament as each of the American Colonies had its legislature or assembly. British statesmen asserted the right of the Parliament of Great Britain to tax Ireland and generally to regulate its affairs exactly as they contended it had the right to impose whatever burdens it thought fit upon the American Colonies. The right thus asserted had been exercised so freely and harshly as to be grievously repressive of Irish industry and to drive the so-called Scotch-Irish in great numbers to America, while the penal laws, which Montesquieu declared 'could have been made only by devils and should be registered only in hell,' caused their Catholic brethren to seek the same asylum. Swift, Flood, and Grattan had successively led Irish opinion in protest against the same usurpations with reference to Ireland of which the American patriots complained. Franklin visited Dublin on the eve of the outbreak, before independence was seriously contemplated, to confer with Irish leaders over common wrongs. The Continental Congress, assembled speedily after the engagement at Lexington, on July 28, 1775, adopted an address to the people of Ireland in justification of the course of the Colonies, in which their official representatives said:

"Accept our most grateful acknowledgments for the friendly disposition you have always shown toward us. We know that you are not without your grievances. We sympathize with you in your distress * * * and we acknowledge, with pleasure and gratitude, that your nation has produced patriots who have nobly distinguished themselves in the cause of humanity and America.

"The struggle against the pretensions of the British Parliament to 'legislate in all cases whatsoever' throughout the Empire went on contemporaneously in Ireland and in America, each being mutually helpful to the other. Beset by enemies at home and abroad, Spain having recently become a participant in the war, the English Parliament, by an act passed in 1782, recognized, in effect, Grattan's contention 'that his most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords and commons of Ireland, are the only power competent to enact laws to bind Ireland.' The negotiations for peace with America were even then pending, and Greene says that—

"The grant of independence to the one great dependency made it easier to recognize the freedom of the other.

"The substantial independence of Ireland thus gained was of short duration, however. In the year 1800, during the ministry of the younger Pitt, the Irish Parliament, in which, it may be remarked, no Roman Catholic was eligible to membership or permitted to sit, upon the solicitation of the British ministry, passed the so-called act of union, by which it ceased to exist and the power to legislate for Ireland passed to the Parliament sitting in London. The historian last referred to—a standard English writer, bear in mind—tells us that the assent of the perfidious Irish representatives was 'bought with a million in money and with a liberal distribution of pensions and peerages,' and he adds that 'base and shameless as were such means, Pitt may fairly plead that they were the only means by which the bill for the union could have been passed.' From that day to this the agitation has gone on to undo the work thus consummated."

I then gave a brief account of the agitation which has been carried on from that day to this, and then spoke as follows:

"We hastened to express to them our sympathy when we were fellow sufferers and felt in need of their moral support in our resistance to alien rule. Why should we not now express the hope that is general, if not universal, in this country that they may soon realize their hope of a government of their own choice? We have earned the right to speak at least with the frankness of a friend to Great Britain, remembering that but two short years ago her representatives were here, virtually confessing defeat in the war and frantically appealing to us to hasten into the fray, lest all should be lost before our aid could be made effective.

"We have earned the right to say to her that her treatment of Ireland is a constant menace to the amity we are desirous of preserving unimpaired between the two countries.

"There is not a controversy that arises between them, however trivial in fact, the seriousness of which is not magnified by reason of the irritating factor of Ireland's wrongs. Some day an inconsequential blaze may be fanned into a conflagration. Should any dispute with Britain ever arise upon which the people of the United States are otherwise nearly evenly divided, it is scarcely disputable that our citizens of Irish blood would be found massed against a peaceful settlement not because they are willing to involve this country in the horrors of another world war with the sole object of securing independence for Ireland but because they would approach the consideration of the question from the standpoint of American interest and honor, with an inherited prejudice against Britain, which, unfortunately, recent action and inaction touching Ireland have done little to eradicate.

* * * * * * *

"I join in the assertion that there is no people and no nation to which the principle of self-determination is more distinctly applicable than to the Irish people and Ireland. It is refreshing to note that the peril in which our relations to Great Britain stand from the cause to which I have adverted is being recognized by her statesmen and publicists.

"In a recent address Gen. Smuts said that the most pressing of all questions before the Empire is the Irish question, and he added:

"It has become a chronic wound whose septic effects are spreading to our whole system, and through its influence on America is beginning to poison our most vital foreign relations. * * * Unless it is settled on the great principles which form the basis of this Empire this Empire must cease to exist.

"In one of a series of letters recently appearing in the London Times, reproduced in American journals, advocating the immediate grant of dominion home rule to Ireland, is this significant comment:

"At the center of the Empire is the weakness of the Irish quarrel. It is felt at its farthest confines; it hampers our foreign policy; it is an open breach for our enemies. The British people can not afford to wait. A disease which restricts action can not afford to wait.

"If we have no duty in the premises we may with entire propriety say to Great Britain that we are looking to her promptly to apply the principle of self-determination, announced by President Wilson and indorsed by her in her hour of extremity, to Ireland."

Mr. President, I am glad I was interrupted by the question addressed to me by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], because it gives me an opportunity to emphasize the fact that under article 11 nothing further is contemplated than that the cause of Ireland, her right to self-government, to a government of the choice of her own people, may be presented to the league of nations, either to the council or the assembly, and in that way to the whole world.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he believes one nation presenting to the council of the league of nations the question of depriving another of a portion of its territory and political independence is carrying out the contract of that nation under article 10 to respect and preserve the political independence and territorial integrity of that nation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I see no reason why it is not. I see no inconsistency whatever between article 10 and article 11. Article 10 simply guarantees that we undertake to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence as against external aggression. That is all. If there is an internal uprising in which any people outside are interested, those people are forbidden, under article 10, to resort to war to express their ideas concerning the matter——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But they have an opportunity possibly to express their views under article 11. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to correct the Senator in one particular. It is not alone external aggression, but threat of external aggression.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator, under his construction of article 11, if a dispute is taken jurisdiction of by the council, if there, by unanimous action, they do anything at all toward securing the freedom of Ireland, would it not be a threat of external aggression?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator kindly repeat his question?

Mr. LENROOT. Article 10, as the Senator knows, is not alone external aggression, but the threat of external aggression. If an appeal is made to the council or the league under article 11 to secure the freedom of Ireland, and the council acts unanimously for that purpose, does not that constitute a threat of external aggression?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not in any sense whatever. External aggression has a clear meaning in article 10; it means the making of war by one country or one nation upon another nation.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator another question. If, under article 11, jurisdiction can be taken of the Irish question, can not like jurisdiction be taken of the immigration question in this country, the tariff question, or almost any other domestic question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The situation to which the Senator refers is taken care of, as he well knows, in another provision, which provides that if the objection is raised that any question is a domestic matter the league takes no action.

Mr. LENROOT. Then does the Senator take the position that if Great Britain should raise the point that the Irish question is a domestic question they could not take jurisdiction under article 11?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They could not take jurisdiction at all. I thought I made that pretty clear. Perhaps I may repeat myself about the matter.

The language of article 10, to which the Senator refers, is very specific. It does not deny jurisdiction over any question. If the league finds that a question is domestic, it does not act in the matter at all. I have endeavored to explain with respect to this question that it is not action by the league at all that is expected or anticipated in this matter.

It simply affords a forum before which the cause can be presented. In its preparation the covenant was particularly guarded so that there should be no opportunity for a decision in a matter of this character, and very wisely so, because if the cause of Ireland could be presented to the council or to the assembly and the council or assembly could decide in one particular way and take action in favor of Irish independence, like the Holy Alliance, they could take action against Irish independence; in other words, the whole question would be submitted to their action and determination and they would be obliged to govern themselves accordingly and to suppress the efforts of people to establish their independence. It was intended that the council should have no such power; but the covenant, as I have stated, simply affords a forum before which oppressed people anywhere upon the earth may go and have their cause heard before the whole world.

Mr. LENROOT. Why is there not a like forum for the question of immigration? The Senator from Montana in reply to me stated in answer to that inquiry that that was taken care of by the provision relating to domestic questions. I should like to have the Senator show how, if that provision applies to prevent immigration, coming under the terms of article 11, it does not also apply to prevent the Irish question coming under article 11.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I also dealt with that when I previously spoke on this subject. In my own view the Irish question—the question of Irish independence—is not a purely domestic question. I quoted from Gen. Smuts here to indicate that it is quite a different thing from a purely domestic question. He says that it poisons their entire system and affects their foreign relations and particularly their relations with America, giving to it an international aspect as well as a domestic aspect.

Mr. LENROOT. But does the Senator——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I have also called the attention of the Senator to the fact that when Cuba endeavored to establish her independence our Government declined to recognize that that was a purely domestic question within the dominion of the Kingdom of Spain. Inasmuch as it affected so directly the lives of our own people, we chose to regard it as an international problem.

Mr. LENROOT. The same reasoning would make the question of Japanese immigration with the United States an international question and not solely a domestic question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Well, suppose that should follow; the council could not do anything about it.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand; but I wanted to get the Senator's view as to whether under article 11 the council could take jurisdiction of immigration into this country. He now says it could not, as I understand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Wait a moment. It is not a question of jurisdiction. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that the Japanese representative before the council of the league of nations may stand up any time he sees fit and talk as long as the rules of that body will permit him to talk on racial equality. Does the Senator doubt it?

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well.

Mr. LENROOT. But that is not the proposition. Can the council take jurisdiction and make a recommendation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It can not. It is a domestic question.

Mr. LENROOT. It is not any more so than is the Irish question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I think it is a little more so; but even if it were not I do not assert—I think I have made myself perfectly clear—that there can be any recommendation concerning the Irish question.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Senator from Montana just stated that in the case of the Cuban situation we declined to recognize it as a purely domestic question. Japan could likewise refuse to recognize the question of Japanese emigration to the United States as being a domestic question, and, by the Senator's reasoning, the council would take full jurisdiction of Japanese immigration under the terms of article 11.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator from Wisconsin may reason that way, but I do not.

Mr. President, this resolution is not offered in any spirit of hostility to the British Empire or to England. It is offered in the hope that an irritating factor in the relations that subsist between these two great Governments may be removed; and I hope it will be speedily removed. I have no doubt the overwhelming sentiment of the people of this country is in favor of granting to the Irish an opportunity at least to present their cause before a world forum.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has stated that the league of nations would not be debarred from the consideration of the question which he has presented by his resolution so far as article 10 of the covenant is concerned, because that article limits the obligations of the members of the league to respect and to preserve the territorial integrity and the existing political independence of all members of the league only against external aggression. Consequently the Senator replies that, so far as the consideration of this question is concerned, it can be presented to the league, notwithstanding article 10.

The question is presented by the Senator from Montana in a resolution in the Senate of the United States affecting the political independence of Great Britain to control a part of the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. I fail to see how the Senator can escape the conclusion that that is an external aggression. It looks to me very much as though the United States were external to Great Britain, and certainly the act of the Senator from Montana this morning in bringing up his resolution here is an external attack upon the territorial integrity of Great Britain if the question of Irish independence of Great Britain is involved. The Senator can not escape that conclusion.

The consequence will be that immediately, as soon as the procès-verbal is filed and the league goes into effect, we shall have a case whereby, on account of the action of the Senator from Montana in attacking the political independence of Great Britain and menacing her territorial integrity, the league will go into operation to bring to bear upon the United States all possible economic pressure, authority to exercise which is vested in the league by the covenant.

The first thing we know we may find that, under article 16 and other articles of the league covenant, the great nations of Europe will sever "all trade or financial relations" with the United States, prohibiting "all intercourse" between citizens of the United States and citizens of other nations and undertake to prevent "all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not," because of the breach of international law by the action of the United States Senate in undertaking to interfere in the domestic affairs of Great Britain.

The Senator from Montana says also that this matter can be presented to the league, but that the league will have no power of decision; that even though it were not regarded as a domestic question but were regarded as an international dispute of which the league clearly has jurisdiction, no decision could be rendered; and that even if a decision could be rendered, the existence of six votes on behalf of Great Britain would be no disadvantage to Ireland; that Ireland would be in just as favorable a situation, this matter being presented under a covenant in which the United States has one vote and Great Britain has six votes, as if it were presented to a league in which the United States had 100 votes.

I have never been able to follow the reasoning of the Senator from Montana and other advocates of the league who picture the services which have been rendered by Canada and Australia in this war as a reason for giving them votes in the league and putting them upon an equality with the independent and sovereign nations of the world when in the same argument they claim that those votes are not of any value.

The fact of the case is, whatever the motives and purposes of the Senator from Montana in introducing this resolution may have been, that it is perfectly empty, perfectly meaningless, and worthless in so far as any benefit which might possibly accrue to Ireland is concerned.

If the intention of the Senator from Montana is to create the impression among the Irish voters of the United States that he is doing them or Ireland a service by presenting this resolution and having this question taken up by the league of nations, in which Great Britain and her colonies, constituting the British Empire, have six votes, I do not think that he will deceive them into believing that there is anything substantial in that service. The Senator from Montana says that the six votes of Great Britain will be of no material effect in the consideration of such a question presented to the league. Let us see whether they will or not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to interrupt the Senator. The Senator from Montana has no purpose on earth of endeavoring to deceive the Irish people or anybody else.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not intend, Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Montana appreciates their good will very much, but beyond that it is a matter of indifference to him how they regard him or the resolution. The Senator from Montana introduced the resolution in the hope, as it is expressed therein, that an irritating factor in our relations with Great Britain would be removed. I claim the credit for simple honesty in the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not my purpose to impute any ulterior purpose or any purpose upon the part of the Senator from Montana to deceive the Irish people. The purpose of my statement was to indicate that if the Irish people expected any benefit to come to them from any action under the resolution which has been introduced by the Senator from Montana, they would be grievously disappointed, and that the Senator from Montana would be grievously disappointed if he really thinks any benefit would come to the Irish people from any action that could be taken under this resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, on this point I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Washington; I only want to observe that the Irish people have been accustomed for 100 years or more to be buncoed and gold-bricked. The recent invitation to hold a constitutional convention has come to be so looked upon by Ireland, and that is the reason why the Irish are so incensed—because they have not been dealt with fairly and candidly. The crowning and most insolent effort to bunco the Irish is this resolution of the Senator from Montana. His belated enthusiasm for the cause of Ireland was only in evidence on yesterday. I should like to ask him what show Ireland would have with six hostile delegates from the British Empire, and perchance a statesman like the Senator from Mississippi appointed to represent the American Government as the crowning distinction of his illustrious career.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield further at this time. I will yield to the Senator in a few moments.

A few days ago the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], speaking of this same position of predominance of Great Britain in the league of nations by reason of having six votes, made somewhat the same argument that has been made by the President and by the Senator from Montana and other advocates of the league—that is, that these great self-governing colonies, on account of their heroic sacrifices in the war, are entitled to recognition; and he then followed the same course that they all will follow by coupling that with the assertion that although these votes were given to them as a reward for their sacrifices in the war they were of no benefit to them—a sort of a hollow pretense of a reward for the sacrifices that they have made. The Senator from North Dakota said:

> Mr. President, almost every argument made on the floor of the Senate, and every one without exception made to the public by Senators opposed to any league of nations, has given the impression to the people of the world that the council or the assembly, as the case might be, is a sort of court or tribunal that decides the disputes between nations, and it is because of these misstatements of the facts and the misapprehension of many of our people arising therefrom that the ground is made fertile for the development of about all the animosities toward this league and especially toward the claimed voting power of Great Britain. I have no doubt the letter read by my colleague [Mr. GRONNA] this morning from the State of North Dakota was entirely founded upon that general misapprehension.
> I wish the public could just once fully understand, first, that not one case of dispute out of a hundred would ever go to the council or assembly; second, that even if all other efforts provided for the settlement of disputes should fail, the only thing submitted to the council or assembly is the right to investigate and report the facts to the public.

The same assertion has been made by the leading advocates of the league, those who are chiefly responsible for its formulation and presentation to the world—that this body in which Great Britain has six votes to our one, which the Senator from Montana now asks shall take jurisdiction of the Irish question, is a mere debating society and has no authority to decide anything. The Senator from North Dakota says that only one case out of one hundred would ever go before it.

Let us see what the plain provisions of the league covenant are on that subject.

Article 15 of this covenant provides:

> If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13, the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council. Any party to the dispute may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the secretary general, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof.
> For this purpose the parties to the dispute will communicate to the secretary general, as promptly as possible, statements of their case with all the relevant facts and papers, and the council may forthwith direct the publication thereof.

The council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful, a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the council may deem appropriate.

If the dispute is not thus settled, the council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

Then it proceeds as follows in relation to the assembly, in which Great Britain not only has 6 votes to our 1 but in which she has 18 delegates to our 3 sitting in this assembly. Although there are only 6 votes upon the part of Great Britain and 1 upon the part of the United States, there are 18 delegates upon the part of Great Britain and 3 upon the part of the United States.

If the council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council.

From what I have read, this fact is indisputable, because this language is so plain that it is not capable of ambiguity of construction: That any dispute whatever between two nations that is likely to lead to a rupture—and every dispute which is of any importance is likely to lead to a rupture—which has not been otherwise settled, whether it is claimed by one of the parties to relate to a domestic question or not, may, as a matter of right upon the part of either one of the disputants, be taken into the assembly—not the council, but the assembly—and there it is. The action which the assembly shall take has been defined in the language of the covenant which I have just read.

There has been a great deal of assertion that the result of that action of the council would be merely—I think the President made that statement two or three times in the recent speeches that he has made—to postpone any military action or act of war upon the part of either one of the disputants for a period of nine months. That has been asserted over and over again. Under article 12 it is provided:

The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.

In any case under this article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

So that allowing six months within which the council is to make its report and the three months after that—what is called the "cooling-off period"—there are at least nine months in which neither one of the disputants can go to war if they keep their obligations under this covenant which we are asked to ratify; and it has been repeated over and over again that that was the extent of the limitation upon the sovereign right of a nation to take up arms in defense of its institutions or its citizens that was contained in this league. It seems to have been a deliberate attempt, because the people who have been making this argument are familiar with the instrument to leave out of consideration altogether in the discussion of this question—and I think it is the most vital one in the covenant—this language that is contained in article 15.

It does not say anything about nine months as the period within which a nation's hands shall be stayed by the obligation which it has assumed under this league before it will be able to take action in the defense of some vital right of the nation.

If a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

The same obligation applies in case of decisions by the assembly, which are determined by a majority vote, under the conditions already stated.

There is not any limitation upon the obligation. They will not go to war, not within three months or within six months or within one year, but never. If this instrument is ratified and this Nation becomes a member of the league, a dispute about some question in Montana, perhaps, may come before it. If the league is going to take jurisdiction of such a question as the Irish question, it may take jurisdiction of the claim of citizens of Montana that their comrades have been hung without trial. One man was hung by the neck from a trestle out there because he was trying to create sedition or insurrection, and great numbers of his friends claimed that they had been denied their constitutional rights. That is no more of a domestic question than the Irish question is. They might go before this league, and, if we follow the lead of the Senator from Montana, it will be decided in a tribunal in which we have no vote at all, because we would be one of the interested parties; the British Empire would have six votes; and we would be compelled to accept whatever decision the assembly might make for the settlement of that or any other question which they chose to assume jurisdiction of, the discretion being vested in that tribunal to determine whether it was purely domestic or whether it was of such a character as affected the interests of the world, as the Senator says we decided in the case of Cuba when we took jurisdiction of it as an international matter.

When it is decided, so far from being merely advisory it is absolutely binding, because we have committed ourselves never to take up arms to vindicate our position in the matter. There is no other way in which a nation can assert its rights, when it comes to a dispute over a vital matter with another nation that is decided by a great international tribunal. If we bind ourselves that we will commit no act of war against our antagonist in that controversy who accepts the decision of the league, then the decision becomes final and binding.

That is the advisory character of the assembly, which it is said has no jurisdiction except to talk; and upon that interpretation of it we are asked to ratify this instrument. That is the sort of information that has been given to the public as to the nature of this central tribunal for the decision of world questions and of the foreign relations of all of the members of the league which we are asked to ratify.

I thought, Mr. President, it was an opportune time to call attention to the nature of the power of the assembly of the league of nations, which, if we are to believe the Senator from Montana, can take up and consider, and once taking up and considering, will finally determine under its own jurisdiction even such questions as the integrity of the British Empire or the right of the United States to govern its various dependencies.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said to the effect that immigration is a domestic question, and as such could not be considered by the league.

Immigration is a matter which concerns the movement of the nationals of one nation from their own country into another country. From immemorial times that of necessity has been the subject of international treaties. It could not have been the subject of international treaties unless it was an international question. The dispute between two nations about the respective rights of their nationals is an international dispute. Does any Senator who looks upon this matter with impartiality—does the Senator from Montana, who is interested in the question of immigration to the Pacific coast, doubt that if the question should be presented by Japan to the assembly, where they have a right to go, of the right of her subjects to settle in the United States under the laws of the United States, a dispute which is not merely academic, but which is concrete and actually existing, that the assembly would deny that that was an international dispute? It is bound to be an international dispute if it is a dispute between two nations, and it is perfectly evident that each nation in the case I am mentioning has a substantial interest in it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then it goes to the assembly of the league of nations, and when that assembly decides the question Great Britain would be there with her 18 delegates for consultation and for advice and for influence, with her 6 votes against the 1 vote of the United States. However, the United States would have no vote in such a case as that. Does the Senator doubt that when the assembly decided a case one of the parties to which was a nation that was not only an ally of Great Britain in this war but a general ally under a treaty of alliance between the two nations, the decision of the assembly would be forever binding upon the United States? How could we resist it after we have obligated ourselves that we will not go to war against our antagonist in any such dispute?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood the Senator to address a question to the Senator from Montana, which I shall be very glad to answer. I think the Senator from Washington has rendered a service in calling attention to the binding character of a decision by the assembly. I say to him with perfect frankness, if any question should be presented to the assembly, any dispute in which the United States is interested, and the United States should insist that the question was one of domestic concern purely, and therefore that the assembly, consisting of at least one and possibly three representatives from every nation being a member of the league, should decide against the United States and hold that the question is one of international import and not purely domestic, and thus take jurisdiction of the matter and reach a conclusion unanimously against the United States, so that a determination would be made, I should like to have the world understand that under those circumstances the United States binds itself that it will not go to war. In other words, whenever all the nations of the earth, gathered together, decide and determine a dispute between the United States and another nation and unanimously agree that the United States is in the wrong, I should like to have the world understand that we have obligated ourselves not to go to war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad the Senator has made that statement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me state further——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield further. That makes the matter quite clear. That is very different from the President's view of this matter and the views of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], which I have just read, and the views of all the other advocates of the league whose expressions I have so far heard.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield in a moment. I would like to comment on what the Senator has just said. Their attitude has been that the assembly of the league was merely a conciliatory body, that it could merely debate and make recommendations, and that those recommendations, when reports were made, were merely advisory. The Senator from Montana, if I correctly understand him now, admits—an admission which it seems to me is merely a recognition of the plain language of the covenant—that the United States in such a case, by ratifying this covenant binds itself in advance that it would not go to war against the decision of the assembly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator proceeds, I desire to take exception to the statement that I admit anything. That is the plain language of the covenant. There is no admission. I so assert. But, Mr. President, I assert also that because there must be a unanimous decision, which is remotely improbable——

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is a different question, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That it will amount to anything except a discussion of the question, because it is scarcely conceivable that there can be a real dispute between two nations with respect to which all the other nations of the earth will say that one of them is wrong. So the matter would be merely a debate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am somewhat in doubt now as to whether the Senator admits that we would obligate ourselves not to go to war or whether we do not obligate ourselves.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator need not be in doubt about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Or whether he says he wishes we would obligate ourselves.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If such an improbable thing that there should be a unanimous decision with respect to a controversy between this country and another should be rendered in the assembly, we bind ourselves that we will not go to war against the decision of the assembly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We do bind ourselves?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me understand the Senator from Montana clearly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator understands me perfectly clearly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Do I understand that the Senator from Montana admits that by this covenant we would bind ourselves not to go to war against a nation having a dispute with us that accepts the decision of the assembly?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is nothing equivocal about my statement. The Senator can not possibly have misunderstood it. I do not admit anything. I assert that in the improbable case of a dispute concerning which there would be a unanimous decision of the assembly against us, every nation on earth taking the view that we are wrong about it, we bind ourselves not to go to war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am just as much at a loss now as I was before to know what the Senator's conclusion is as to the obligations which we assume under the covenant of the league of nations, whether the Senator agrees that we would be obligated not to go to war if our antagonist in the dispute accepted the decision of the assembly, or whether we would not be. Evidently, notwithstanding the number of times the Senator has discussed the league of nations, and the intense feeling which he has displayed about the obligations of the United States under this league, he is not familiar with its terms, which surprises me very much. I had thought that the Senator had read the article which he is talking about, and that he knew what are its contents. The Senator assumes that the decisions of this assembly will have to be unanimous, under the terms of article 15. The contrary is the fact. They do not have to be unanimous at all. In view of the fact that evidently the Senator has not read it, or else has forgotten what it is, I will read it now. I have a copy of it in my hands. We might as well know what it is we are talking about.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Montana is perfectly familiar with it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Article 15 reads:

> The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council.
> In any case referred to the assembly all the provisions of this article and of article 12 relating to the action and powers of the council shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority—

Not unanimous, but a majority—> of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

So, Mr. President, so far from this being the case which the Senator has picked out, of every other nation in the world unanimously, as he vehemently emphasized, agreeing to it, it is not declared that every other nation in the world or every other member of the league or every other member of the assembly shall agree to it. It only requires that representatives of those nations who are represented upon the council shall agree to it, and a majority of the other members of the league. That is all that it requires.

Now, Mr. President, let me comment a little further upon another suggestion of the Senator from Montana. He departed from the question which we were discussing, as to what the effect of the covenant would be, and assuming that the covenant was a satisfactory one to the United States—that is, even assuming that the covenant required the unanimous decision of the assembly—he undertook to argue that if the other nations of the world represented in the assembly unanimously decided that as to a question which the Government and the people of the United States claim to be a domestic question, if the other nations of the world, all of whom have conflicting interests with the United States, should decide that it is not a domestic question, we must accept their decision.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one moment and I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The result of that would be, under the interpretation which the Senator from Montana gives to the covenant and which is a much more favorable interpretation than can possibly properly be given to it, that the foreign affairs of the United States would be taken out of the control of the people and the Government of the United States and put under the control of foreign nations; and the Senator from Montana stands in his place and attempts to justify that, and says that he is willing that the independence and sovereignty of this country, which would be involved in such a dispute, should be committed to the decision of foreign peoples if they agree upon a decision.

I yield now to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask a question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. A parliamentary inquiry. What becomes of the resolution now? Does it go to the calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It goes to the calendar.

Mr. BORAH. Will it be permissible, under unanimous consent, to have it remain on the table without prejudice, and would the Senator from Montana be willing to have that course taken?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That course would be quite agreeable to me.

Mr. LODGE. It can be taken from the calendar by motion at any time.

Mr. BORAH. I myself want to discuss the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should be glad to have unanimous consent given that it shall go over without prejudice.

Mr. LODGE. I think it can be reached just as easily on the calendar as on the table. I have no objection, however, to having it go to the table.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over without prejudice.

Mr. LODGE. Of course it is not before the Senate now.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not think consideration of the resolution ought to interfere with the consideration of the peace treaty in any way. Therefore I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The resolution goes to the calendar.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am very glad indeed to have this very clear statement from the Senator from Montana this morning, part of it embodied in the resolution, in the first place that he is not only willing but advocates that the league of nations shall at least consider, I am not thoroughly clear as to whether or not the Senator from Montana thinks they should act upon and decide, such questions as the Irish question. I do not know exactly what he means by the Irish question. I do not know whether he means land laws for the Irish people, or home rule for the Catholic population, or for the north of Ireland, or home rule for a part of them and not for the other part, or whether he means Irish independence. At any rate, whatever the Irish question to be submitted to the league may be defined to be, his position is that the United States, acting through the Senator from Montana as the initiator of the movement in the Senate of the United States, shall intervene in the question and bring it before the league of nations, and that the league of nations shall take it up; and, in the second place, after having vested the league of nations with jurisdiction of questions of that kind, that we shall be bound by their decision, not for nine months, but forever, in case the other members, not involved in the dispute, unanimously agree upon the decision.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that it would be a very easy matter to get a unanimous decision from the other members of the league to abolish the Monroe doctrine. I never knew of a South American country that thought very much of the Monroe doctrine. My impression is that those nations which really owe their existence to it are not friendly to it. They misinterpret it, and it would not be difficult to get them to vote, in the league of nations, for the abolishment of the Monroe doctrine, or to reject any plea that was introduced by the United States in a dispute between it and another nation based upon the Monroe doctrine. Does anyone have any doubt that Japan would vote with the European nations on that question, or that Haiti would vote with them on that question, or that Cuba would do likewise?

I am not sure whether they would or would not, but I am not sure by any means that they would not, and the consequence is that you are submitting to this decision, even though the rule were, as the Senator from Montana mistakenly thought it was, that the decision should be unanimous, jurisdiction over a doctrine, as it is called, a policy of the United States which has come to be one of the unwritten laws of our foreign policy and as essential to the development of the interests of this country as the Constitution itself. There can not be any doubt whatever after this as to the position of at least the Senator from Montana upon those questions.

Now, Mr. President, I want to refer to another feature of the discussion. I have called attention to the fact that we are binding our hands forever to accept the decision of this tribunal in which Great Britain, one of the aggressive nations of the world, has six times the power that the United States has. Cover it up as you may, by sophistry or by an attempt to make plain language mean something else than it actually does mean, the British Empire has six times the power that the United States has in the assembly of the league; and we are told that we must consent to that because of our obligations to Europe. The Senator from Nebraska says that we must give six votes to the British Empire in this league because of the great services that Great Britain and her colonies have rendered in the war.

We aided them at least in winning the war, and it would be supposed that they would have been under obligations to us, but, according to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the greater the services we render the greater are, not their obligations, but ours.

The Senator from Nebraska, who has talked so much about the regard that he has for the Allies and our duty to serve them in Europe after the war is over, stated the other day on the floor of the Senate that he had not changed his position which he occupied during the war toward the several belligerents. He even went so far as to dispute the assertion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that he had introduced an embargo resolution in the Senate after the Lusitania was sunk, and when it was shown that he had introduced it some seven months after the Lusitania was sunk the Senator from Nebraska stated that he had never apologized for it and was not going to apologize for it. I assume that means that he is not going to apologize for the position which he took throughout the war and up to the time of the declaration of armed neutrality, after Germany had made war upon the United States, after the President had appealed to Congress to authorize him to arm our merchant vessels in order to protect them against the war which Germany was making upon them. I only referred to this——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. To what action of mine does the Senator refer at the time of the armed-neutrality discussion?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I refer to the Senator's action in speaking on the floor of the Senate in behalf of Germany.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows that I conducted the armed-neutrality resolution through the Senate as far as it went.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; that was a thing that seemed to me quite peculiar, that the Senator could conduct, nominally, the armed-neutrality resolution, which, my understanding is, came not from the Senator from Nebraska, but from the administration——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It came from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hardly think it originated in the Committee on Foreign Relations. My impression is it came from the Executive branch of the Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It did. It was the recommendation of the President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It came to the Senate and was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator question that I supported that resolution to the limit of my ability?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I certainly do. I fail to see how the Senator could support that resolution to the limit of his ability while he was declaring at the same time, and a long time after it had been introduced, to the limit of his ability, that he sympathized with Germany, that not only the German people but that the German Government were entitled to a great deal of consideration, and when he had pending at that time a bill and a resolution for an embargo upon arms and was attempting to get them passed through Congress, and which, if he had succeeded in getting them passed, would have brought about a German victory.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why does the Senator say that I was attempting at that time to get my embargo bill passed through Congress?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, I will call attention——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows that it was a very material distance previous to that time. The Senator will recall, if he will think a moment, that I led the fight in the Senate and endeavored by every human means to secure the passage of the resolution authorizing the President to arm the merchant ships of the United States and protect our neutrality by arms. The Senator knows that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not know that at all, Mr. President. I know that the Senator urged the adoption of the resolution, but when the Senator at the same time justified the acts of war upon which the proposal for armed neutrality had been based, expressing sympathy for Germany and for the German Government, it impaired to a great extent the strength and influence of his support of the armed-neutrality resolution. I will call attention to the language——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the Senator give some dates now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is confusing one year with another. The Senator knows very well what brought on the demand for armed neutrality and later the demand for war. It was the decision of Germany to retract her promise not to attack American vessels by submarine warfare.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He knows that decision was reached by Germany and announced to the United States in the spring of 1917.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And that when Germany took that position, when she retracted her promise to us, then the administration moved for armed neutrality; and I supported the armed-neutrality resolution. The Senator knows that that armed-neutrality resolution failed because a few Senators here in the Senate fought it and resisted it by filibuster until 12 o'clock noon on the 4th of March, 1917, and that Congress then automatically and necessarily adjourned. He knows that the President thereupon, within a short time, reconvened Congress in extraordinary session; he knows that when Congress convened in extraordinary session it was I who had charge in the Senate of the resolution declaring war on Germany. Now, he knows these things, and why does he state that at that time I was advocating an embargo on arms? He may have confused his dates, but at least he ought to correct his gross misstatements.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the armed-neutrality resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives on February 26, 1917; it was reported with amendments to the House and committed by the House to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on February 28, 1917. That resolution provided as follows:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to supply merchant ships, the property of citizens of the United States and bearing American registry, with defensive arms, and also with the necessary ammunition and means of making use of them in defense against unlawful attack; and that he be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to protect such ships and the citizens of the United States against unlawful attack while in their lawful and peaceful pursuits on the high seas.

That resolution, Mr. President, recognized the fact that unlawful attacks were being made upon the merchant ships of the United States, and had been made upon them previously to the time of the passage of the resolution. The fact is that such attacks had been in process for a considerable period of time. The declaration of war on April 6, 1917, contained this language—not that we declared war upon Germany but that we recognized the state of war existing between Germany and the United States:

That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared, and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

Recognizing at that time the existence of a state of war which had existed for a period of time prior to its recognition by the resolution.

In the address of the President of the United States of April 2, 1917, at the joint session of the two Houses of Congress, the President said:

On the 3d of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement—

"The 3d of February." I beg the Senator from Nebraska to note that date—

On the 3d of February last I officially laid before you the extraordinary announcement of the Imperial German Government that on and after the 1st day of February it was its purpose to put aside all restraints of law or of humanity and use its submarines to sink every vessel that sought to approach either the ports of Great Britain and Ireland or the western coasts of Europe or any of the ports controlled by the enemies of Germany within the Mediterranean.

And he proceeded to say:

I was, for a little while, unable to believe that such things would in fact be done by any Government that had hitherto subscribed to the humane practices of civilized nations. International law had its origin in the attempt to set up some law which would be respected and observed upon the seas, where no nation had right of dominion and where lay the free highways of the world. By painful stage after stage has that law been built up, with meager enough results, indeed, after all was accomplished that could be accomplished, but always with a clear view, at least, of what the heart and conscience of mankind demanded. This minimum of right the German Government has swept aside under the plea of retaliation and necessity and because it had no weapons which it could use at sea except these which it is impossible to employ as it is employing them without throwing to the winds all scruples of humanity or of respect for the understandings that were supposed to underlie the intercourse of the world. I am not now thinking of the loss of property involved, immense and serious as that is, but only of the wanton and wholesale destruction of the lives of noncombatants, men, women, and children, engaged in pursuits which have always, even in the darkest periods of modern history, been deemed innocent and legitimate. Property can be paid for; the lives of peaceful and innocent people can not be. The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind.

It is a war against all nations. American ships have been sunk, American lives taken, in ways which it has stirred us very deeply to learn of, but the ships and people of other neutral and friendly nations have been sunk and overwhelmed in the waters in the same way. There has been no discrimination. The challenge is to all mankind. Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. The choice we make for ourselves must be made with a moderation of counsel and a temperateness of judgment befitting our character and our motives as a nation. We must put excited feeling away. Our motive will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of the physical might of the Nation, but only the vindication of right, of human right, of which we are only a single champion.

I read that, Mr. President, and call attention to the language of the resolution recognizing a state of war and the bill authorizing the President to arm our merchant ships in order to show the conditions which not only then existed but had existed for a considerable period of time previous to that, during which time the Senator from Nebraska used the language to which I have called attention on the particular date I have mentioned.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has read the President's statement that Germany withdrew the promise she had made and proceeded to unrestricted submarine warfare; the Senator knows that the promise made by Germany in 1916 was kept for a number of months and not withdrawn until the 31st day of January, 1917; and when Germany withdrew it and proceeded to make submarine warfare upon our vessels the President then demanded, first, the armament of our ships to protect our neutrality, and immediately thereafter he demanded action by Congress declaring a state of war. The Senator is not warranted in saying that this condition had existed long; it had only existed since the 31st day of January, 1917, for that was the date when Germany withdrew her promise; that was the date when she proceeded to unrestricted submarine warfare, and it was that act of Germany which caused the action of the United States leading us into the war against Germany.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that the condition was not a protracted one. For many months Germany was operating under the promise not to do those things which she finally decided to do against us on the 31st day of January, 1917.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. President, a considerable period of time elapsed between the 31st day of January, 1917, and the 4th day of March, 1917, when the armed neutrality resolution was temporarily delayed by the close of the Congress. A considerable period of time elapsed between the 31st day of January and April 6, 1917, when the declaration recognizing the existence of a state of war between Germany and the United States was adopted. Furthermore, Mr. President, the Lusitania was sunk in May, 1915. That was the most egregious of all the piratical acts of Germany in violation of the rights of American citizens upon the high seas which she committed. The Senator knew of that; the whole world knew of it; the sentiment of our people was known in regard to it. It was still uncondoned, notwithstanding the weary series of notes that were exchanged. Long after that, long after Germany had broken her promise and renewed her warfare upon American citizens pursuing their peaceful occupations upon the high seas, the Senator from Nebraska, who now charges his opponents in this matter pending before the Senate with being the associates only of Bolshevist organizations and of catering to the German vote, was espousing the cause of Germany in the war, or at least declaring himself a neutral, and on other occasions declaring himself in sympathy with Germany and asking for consideration not only for the German people but for the German Government.

The Senator from Nebraska on December 7, 1914, introduced a bill, being Senate bill 6688, providing as follows:

That it shall be unlawful and treated as a breach of the neutrality laws of the United States for any person, partnership, or corporation to sell or contract to sell, or deliver or contract to deliver, during the existence of war between nations with which the United States is at peace any arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives of any kind whatsoever to be used against a country or nation with which the United States is at peace; and during the existence of war it shall be unlawful to sell for exportation or to export arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives, except upon filing with the Secretary of Commerce such satisfactory sworn proof that said arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives are not intended to be used in violation of this act.

Any person violating this act shall be fined not more than $100,000 and imprisoned not more than three years, and any arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives, the exportation of which is attempted in violation of this act, shall be forfeited, one-half to the use of the informer and one-half to the use of the United States.

On the same date, Mr. President, to show the activity and interest of the Senator from Nebraska in this matter, he introduced Senate resolution 488. It provided:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether and to what extent arms, ammunition, artillery, and other similar munitions of war have been exported from the United States to each of the belligerent nations in the present war, and to Canada, for each month from the 1st of August to the 1st of December.

Resolved also, That he inform the Senate to what extent contracts with American concerns are now being executed for the manufacture and exportation of arms, ammunition, and artillery, and that said statements be so far as possible in detail.

Again, Mr. President, on February 2, 1915, the Senator proposed as an amendment to Senate bill 6856, and had printed, practically the same proposition as that which is included in the bill and resolution which I have just read.

Still later than that——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment. On December 7, 1915, the Senator again, seven months after the sinking of the Lusitania, introduced Senate bill 380, entitled "A bill to prohibit individuals, partnerships, or corporations in the United States from selling arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives of any kind for exportation during the existence of war except upon proof that said arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives are not to be used in said war against a country with which the United States is at peace."

During the interval between the introduction of these various bills, and at the time they were introduced, the RECORD shows that the Senator from Nebraska was exceedingly active in pressing them for adoption. About that time there was a powerful organization in the United States with some such title as "The American Embargo Association," organized of sympathizers with Germany for the purpose of bringing about the adoption of this legislation; and in the effort to bring it about the Senator from Nebraska not only introduced bills but introduced resolutions, and not only introduced separate resolutions and bills but introduced amendments to other bills then pending, and spoke in favor of them in the Senate.

I pause to make this comment upon that, Mr. President, and I would not have called attention to it but for the epithets that have been used by the Senator from Nebraska in this debate and to illuminate his expressions of affection, now that the war is over, for our allies—that it would have been a good deal better if he had indicated some sympathy, if not affection, for them while they were fighting in a desperate situation for the preservation of their nationality and independence. On the contrary, however, if the Senator from Nebraska at that time, when they needed friends and assistance, had succeeded in accomplishing what he undertook to do, the Allies would not now be making a victorious peace, but Germany would be dictating peace to the world.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska had had his way in this war which he talks about in his support of the league of nations, instead of curbing Germany, which he now says he wants to do, it would have been equivalent to leading into the field in behalf of Germany an army of a million well-armed soldiers. They would have done Germany no more good, they would have contributed no more to her success, than would the placing of an embargo upon the shipment of the necessary materials for the conduct of the war which they were obliged to obtain at that time in the United States, as proposed in the persistent efforts of the Senator from Nebraska, if he had succeeded in having his way, though he now claims to be such a good friend of the Allies.

Mr. President, by reference to volume 52, page 3938, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the date of February 17, 1915, this language will be discovered, used on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Nebraska, indicating his attitude at that time, for which, as I understand, he says he has no apologies to make:

> Mr. President, let me come to the issue. Is it an act of unneutrality in the midst of war for the United States to prohibit its citizens from selling arms and ammunitions manufactured in this country to belligerent nations that are making war upon nations with which we are at peace? The argument that this is so is made upon this theory, that one of the great sides to this horrible war has succeeded in getting command of the sea; that it is solely able to draw upon our great resources and to purchase our arms and ammunition; and that to pass this act at this time would be to withdraw from it the benefit which it enjoys and the advantage which it has gained.

On page 3939 he says:

> I say, Mr. President, it is time this country again awakened to the fact that we have a responsibility to share in what is going on; and I may say, by way of interruption to myself at this time, that I believe the time is at hand when the United States should lead the neutral nations of the world and take aggressive steps to bring this war to a close.

That was while Germany was in occupation of Belgium and northern France, in the full flush of the atrocities which shocked the world; and the Senator from Nebraska declared that we should withdraw our support from those nations which were standing for civilization, and that we should bring the war to a close. Of course, it is needless to say that that would have been a German victory.

At the same time and at the same place the Senator used this language:

> Why, we have already seen in this country, Mr. President, what it means. It means that, by permitting this traffic, we are arraying citizen against citizen, race against race; and while a few months ago there was a friendly feeling between all of the various stocks which have come from Europe, where German and Bohemian and Pole and Russian and Swede and Englishman and Frenchman all lived together in comparative peace and harmony, there is developing in this country at the present time a tendency which threatens to disintegrate our population into the different races; which threatens to array race against race in the United States.
> I say the fact that we are in such a position, the fact that we have such a heterogeneous population, the fact that we have the sons of so many European countries in our own midst, is a reason why we, at least, above all the nations in the world, should keep out of any entanglements in time of war. We should carry the policy of abstention to the limit.

Not only, Mr. President, has the Senator reversed his attitude toward France and Great Britain, who were the chief instruments in checking the wicked ambitions of Germany, but he has reversed his attitude toward European entanglements. He has become the advocate not only of entanglements but of union with Europe, and the advocate of a covenant of international government which ties the United States to Europe and to Asia and to other parts of the world that are represented in the league, in every controversy of importance which may arise in those parts of the world, whether it is a matter of interest to our people or not. It is quite a contrast to the attitude that the Senator took during the war.

At the same time, the Senator said in the Senate:

> I have no friendships and no sympathies on either side.

Now that we have won the war, he says that our friendship must go to the extent of sharing in all the burdens of the future which may afflict these allies. At the time when they needed friends and at the time when such an emergency had arisen that it threatened the integrity of the United States the Senator said he had no friendships.

In volume 53 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1613, on January 27, 1916, about a year later, the Senator was still indifferent as to whether or not France and Great Britain survived in this frightful contest. The Senator did not care at that time whether they won or lost. He apparently was perfectly indifferent as to what the consequences to the United States would be if Germany overran Europe, consolidated the resources of materials and of men of those conquered countries, and hurled them in due time, when she was ready, against the United States. The Senator did not care. He was indifferent because, he said, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> I am a neutral, Mr. President.

He not only said that he was a neutral, but he also said:

> I do not want to see either side in this war crush the other side. I am against having either of them victorious.

Now, when they do not need friends, when they are victorious, when they are the masters of Europe, it might be of some interest to them, if not to our own people, to recall the fact that when they did need friends the Senator said that he did not want to see them victorious—the advocate of a league of nations! That was almost a year after Germany had perpetrated the marine outrage of torpedoing a passenger ship without notice and without any attempt to save the passengers, which the rules of decency and of international law required. The Senator from Nebraska was not indignant at that. At least, he was not indignant to the extent of caring whether or not the nation which had perpetrated it succeeded in her ambitions and designs of conquest, which meant the domination of the world and ultimately, I believe, if she succeeded, either a contest between the United States singlehanded against the consolidated resources of Europe under German dictation or else the domination by Germany of the United States as well as the rest of the world.

I think all of this throws considerable light upon the sincerity of the arguments that are made about the advisability of the ratification of this league because of the necessity of curbing Germany. The Senator from Nebraska says that we must ratify this league because it curbs Germany. Mr. President, Germany was curbed when the back of her army was broken by the Allied troops in the Argonne in November, 1918. The war was won then, and from that time to this three nations of Europe have been able alone, without the assistance of the Senator from Nebraska or of the United States, to put Europe in order.

The Senator now says that we must ratify the league of nations, the treaty of peace, and the International Labor Conference, because if we do not do that we may not be able to assist in fixing the customs duties of Germany. That is one of the arguments that he is put to in favor of the league of nations. Mr. President, the time has never been in the history of American commerce, at least not for many years, when this Nation was not able to secure perfectly fair trade agreements with all other nations in the world. The control of the United States over the commerce of the United States, which does not depend upon a league of nations, is sufficient protection to our interests in the German customs tariffs.

So it may be said as to the argument which the Senator from Nebraska makes in behalf of the ratification of this league, because through it our title to the proceeds of the alien property which has been sold in this country may be secured. As was very well said by another Senator the other day, that is in the possession of this country, and we are able to protect it. I assume that we do not want to do anything unjust in regard to it. We are able to decide what is right, and we are able to defend our position after we have decided what is right in regard to that proposition, whether this treaty is ratified or not.

The Senator says that it would be poltroonery and dishonor for the United States now to abandon France and England, although he thought it was highly honorable to abandon them in 1915. In volume 54, page 2235, on January 30, 1917, shortly before the armed neutrality resolution was presented and about the time Germany renewed her submarine warfare, which is the circumstance to which I referred a moment ago, the Senator from Nebraska supported the declaration of the President made to the Senate in favor of a peace without victory, thereby reiterating the attitude which he had expressly stated in the Senate on various occasions, that he did not want to see either side victorious. Referring to that declaration of the President for a peace without victory, the Senator from Nebraska said on January 30, 1917:

> It has been received in every great country in the world and read by millions of the people of the world, and it has met a responsive chord in every country. It is to-day an issue in every great nation, and it is to-day the greatest influence for hastening the advent of peace and bringing a close to this terrible war.

I repeat, Mr. President, the thing which he was there eulogizing was the peace without victory of either side.

So, Mr. President, much later than that, long after the armed-neutrality resolution had been introduced—for it had been reported in the House of Representatives on February 28, 1917, and I have called attention to the date when it was introduced—the Senator said he changed his position. He must have made a lightning change, judging from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Three days after the introduction of this armed-neutrality resolution in the Senate, after it had passed the House of Representatives, only one month before we entered into the war, March 4, 1917, as reported in volume 54, page 5018, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Senator from Nebraska used this language:

> I feel, Mr. President, therefore, a sympathy for the German people, who, after all, are only living the lives that their destiny requires them to lead.

At that time the German Army, composed of all the able-bodied male members of the German people, were committing all the atrocities that their ingenuity could think of in the destruction of life and property in Belgium and northern France. The Senator from Nebraska said he sympathized with them. They were then engaged in enslaving and despoiling the people of France and Belgium, and in the pillage of those countries.

The Senator not only sympathized with the people, but he praised the Government of Germany, in this language:

> We are wont to condemn their Government, Mr. President, and because our sympathies go strongly to the other side, we forget that the Government of Imperial Germany has done more for the common people, the masses of the German people, during the last 45 years than any country in Europe, at least, has done for its people.

Not only that, but the Senator from Nebraska at the same time condoned the German atrocities, which aroused the indignation of the world, committed against these allies that he thinks now we ought not to desert, ought to cleave to after they have won the victory, when he would not cleave to them while they were in the midst of the fight. Said the Senator from Nebraska:

> When a man is crowded against the wall or is fighting for his wife and his children, he will not think of the means that may be necessary. * * *
> Do Senators think that the parents of those children * * * are going to observe the ancient rules of international law?

He further eulogized the President in his persistent efforts to bring about a peace without victory, saying:

> It is not only the people of the United States who owe this great debt of gratitude to the President, it is the people of all the world; * * * the son of any one of these countries is indebted to the President of the United States for having succeeded * * * in keeping one of the great nations out of this awful calamity.

Mr. President, the Zimmerman note, of notorious memory, was published in the United States on March 1, 1917. Everybody remembers the feeling of the citizens of the United States when that note was published, indicating an effort on the part of Germany to stir up a conspiracy with Mexico and Japan to partition the United States, to give California to Japan, Texas to Mexico, and most of the rest of the United States to Germany. When everybody else was quite indignant about that note the Senator from Nebraska said, as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 54, page 4595, on March 1, 1917:

> I am sorry to say that much the Senator from Missouri has declared as to false reports or conspiracies to circulate them is true. The American mind has been poisoned with false reports, and we have had an opinion created in the United States which has not altogether been justified by the facts.

Of course, that was a long time after the Bernstorff atrocities. The Senator from Nebraska, who now talks about the poltroonery of those who will not agree to submit the foreign affairs of the United States to the control of the league of nations, used these words many months after Von Bernstorff had employed his agents to murder the citizens of the United States, blow up its manufacturing establishments, insult its Government, and recompense the people of the United States for the hospitality which he had received by the violation of their laws and the commission of innumerable indecencies. The Senator from Nebraska still thought that the American mind had been poisoned by false reports against Germany and German agents.

Mr. President, the sincerity of the appeals which are made by the Senator who has charge of this covenant of the league of nations, to ratify it on account of obligations that we owe to France and to Great Britain, is to be considered in connection with his declarations at an earlier day as to the real feeling which he had toward those great free nations, in the midst of their desperate struggle for liberty and civilization. It is for that purpose, and in order to throw some illuminating light upon the arguments of the Senator from Nebraska, that I have called attention to these records.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate from the reading of the treaty. I think this form of filibuster is very obnoxious, aside from the personal attack involved. I am not an issue in this controversy. I did introduce an embargo bill on the first day Congress was in session after the war broke out. I introduced it on the 7th of December, 1914, and I affirm now it would have been wise for the United States to have maintained its neutrality, and not to have sold arms and munitions in enormous quantities, by which this country was practically converted into a base of supplies for one side.

I do not believe, and never have believed, that such action on our part, if we had prohibited the export of arms and munitions in enormous quantities, would have resulted in a German victory. I have no idea that it would, because at that time Russia with her full power was in the field. It would probably have resulted in an earlier peace, and instead of having the welter and the ruin which we behold all over the world now, with 7,000,000 dead men and twice 7,000,000 cripples, the war would have been brought to an end without any such result.

Ultimately it may be better and it probably will be better, I am frank to say now, to have militarism wiped off the face of the earth, as it has been. It may be better, and it probably will be better, that the Empires of Russia, Germany, and Austria-Hungary have disappeared, but at that time, if the United States had passed an embargo bill and refused to allow itself to be made the military base for either side, the result would have been the adoption of a peace without any victory on either side. With Russia still pounding at the doors of eastern Germany, Great Britain in command of the sea, and France with an enormous army in the field, the result would probably have been a peace without victory, it probably would have been a compromise, and the United States would not have been involved in the war.

But, Mr. President, the Senator well knows that when I introduced that resolution on the first day the Congress met after the war opened—December 7, 1914—that did not express sympathy for either side. That was purely a question that this country might remain neutral, under the proclamation of the President of the United States that was not questioned anywhere. No Senator rose in his place to move a declaration of war, though that is the function of Congress. The whole country acquiesced in the idea of neutrality, and it was only those people making millions and hundreds of millions of dollars out of the manufacture of munitions, to keep the war alive, who objected to it and objected to the position which I took.

I want to say, furthermore, Mr. President, that the Senator who has just taken his seat, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], himself supported my resolution in the Senate of the United States. He remembers when I offered it as an amendment to the shipping bill. He remembers when a motion was made to lay it on the table, and he joined me at that time in voting against laying it on the table, and so did 34 other Senators here. It ill becomes the Senator at this time, for the purpose of making a little personal attack upon me, to bring up that matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that is all I care to say. I would prefer to have the Senator's ill will and bad opinion than his good opinion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am very sorry I can not accommodate the Senator. I have a very good opinion of him. The fact that I called attention to his congressional record ought not to anger him so. I made no animadversions upon the Senator. I simply read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Of course, the Senator's heat and the Senator's indignant expression is not a matter of any great concern. I do not think the Senator will feel that way after he thinks the matter over.

I only rose to say that I never supported his resolution, I never voted for it, and never spoke in behalf of it, and if it had ever come to a vote before the Senate I would have voted against it. A great many people voted to keep the matter before the Senate in order to defeat it, in order to prevent an evasion of the direct issue, and to put the Senate's attitude in the matter on record before the country and the Allies. Of course, I do not recollect about motions to lay matters upon the table at that date. I know that I never supported in any way his resolution, but, on the contrary, was at all times actively opposed to it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, inasmuch as that question is now raised, I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 18, 1915:

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nebraska proposes to amend House amendment No. 3 by adding, at the end of section 16, the following:

"That it shall be unlawful and treated as a breach of the neutrality laws of the United States for any person, partnership, or corporation to sell or contract to sell, or deliver or contract to deliver, during the existence of war between nations with which the United States is at peace, any arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives of any kind whatsoever to be used against a country or nation with which the United States is at peace; and during the existence of war it shall be unlawful to sell for exportation or to export arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives, except upon filing with the Secretary of Commerce satisfactory sworn proof that said arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives are not intended to be used in violation of this provision.

"Any person violating this provision shall be fined not more than $100,000 and imprisoned not more than three years, and any arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives the exportation of which is attempted in violation of this provision shall be forfeited, one-half to the use of the informer and one-half to the use of the United States."

The motion was then made to lay that amendment on the table. Fifty-one Senators voted to lay it on the table, and thus defeated it. Thirty-six Senators, endeavoring to save it, voted against laying it on the table. Of course I was one, and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] was another.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean to say that whenever a Senator votes to lay a matter on the table he is opposed to it or is in favor of it? I wish to say to the Senator that it has been my practice not to vote to lay a measure on the table unless absolutely necessary in order to carry forward business that should be passed at a very early day. I always prefer to vote direct upon the question. That may have been the case on the very question referred to. I am simply stating my position with reference to the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the treaty.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the treaty, at the top of page 287, and read as follows:

"The Commission shall give representatives of the German Government an opportunity and a time to be heard as to their capacity to furnish the said materials, articles and animals.

"The decision of the Commission shall thereupon and at the earliest possible moment be communicated to the German Government and to the several interested Allied and Associated Governments.

"The German Government undertakes to deliver the materials, articles and animals as specified in the said communication, and the interested Allied and Associated Governments severally agree to accept the same, provided they conform to the specification given, or are not, in the judgment of the Commission, unfit to be utilized in the work of reparation.

"5.

"The Commission shall determine the value to be attributed to the materials, articles and animals to be delivered in accordance with the foregoing, and the Allied or Associated Power receiving the same agrees to be charged with such value, and the amount thereof shall be treated as a payment by Germany to be divided in accordance with Article 237 of this Part of the Present Treaty.

"In cases where the right to require physical restoration as above provided is exercised, the Commission shall ensure that the amount to be credited against the reparation obligation of Germany shall be the fair value of work done or materials supplied by Germany, and that the claim made by the interested Power in respect of the damage so repaired by physical restoration shall be discharged to the extent of the proportion which the damage thus repaired bears to the whole of the damage thus claimed for.

"1.

"Germany accords the following options for the delivery of coal and derivatives of coal to the undermentioned signatories of the present Treaty.

"2.

"Germany undertakes to deliver to France seven million tons of coal per year for ten years. In addition, Germany undertakes to deliver to France annually for a period not exceeding ten years an amount of coal equal to the difference between the annual production before the war of the coal mines of the Nord and Pas de Calais, destroyed as a result of the war, and the production of the mines of the same area during the years in question: such delivery not to exceed twenty million tons in any one year of the first five years, and eight million tons in any one year of the succeeding five years.

"It is understood that due diligence will be exercised in the restoration of the destroyed mines in the Nord and the Pas de Calais.

"3.

"Germany undertakes to deliver to Belgium eight million tons of coal annually for ten years.

"4.

"Germany undertakes to deliver to Italy up to the following quantities of coal:

"July 1919 to June 1920		4½	million tons,
" — 1920	— 1921	6	—
" — 1921	— 1922	7½	—
" — 1922	— 1923	8	—
" — 1923	— 1924	8½	—
and each of the following five years

"At least two-thirds of the actual deliveries to be land-borne.

"5.

"Germany further undertakes to deliver annually to Luxemburg, if directed by the Reparation Commission, a quantity of coal equal to the pre-war annual consumption of German coal in Luxemburg.

"6.

"The prices to be paid for coal delivered under these options shall be as follows:

"(a) For overland delivery, including delivery by barge, the German pithead price to German nationals, plus the freight to French, Belgian, Italian or Luxemburg frontiers, provided that the pithead price does not exceed the pithead price of British coal for export. In the case of Belgian bunker coal, the price shall not exceed the Dutch bunker price.

"Railroad and barge tariffs shall not be higher than the lowest similar rates paid in Germany.

"(b) For sea delivery, the German export price f. o. b. German ports, or the British export price f. o. b. British ports, whichever may be lower.

"7.

"The Allied and Associated Governments interested may demand the delivery, in place of coal, of metallurgical coke in the proportion of 3 tons of coke to 4 tons of coal.

"8.

"Germany undertakes to deliver to France, and to transport to the French frontier by rail or by water, the following products, during each of the three years following the coming into force of this Treaty:

Benzol	35,000 tons.
Coal tar	50,000 tons.
Sulphate of ammonia	30,000 tons.

"All or part of the coal tar may, at the option of the French Government, be replaced by corresponding quantities of products of distillation, such as light oils, heavy oils, anthracene, napthalene or pitch.

"9.

"The price paid for coke and for the articles referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be the same as the price paid by German nationals under the same conditions of shipment to the French frontier or to the German ports, and shall be subject to any advantages which may be accorded similar products furnished to German nationals.

"10.

"The foregoing options shall be exercised through the intervention of the Reparation Commission, which, subject to the specific provisions hereof, shall have power to determine all questions relative to procedure and the qualities and quantities of products, the quantity of coke which may be substituted for coal, and the times and modes of delivery and payment. In giving notice to the German Government of the foregoing options the Commission shall give at least 120 days' notice of deliveries to be made after January 1, 1920, and at least 30 days' notice of deliveries to be made between the coming into force of this Treaty and January 1, 1920. Until Germany has received the demands referred to in this paragraph, the provisions of the Protocol of December 25, 1918, (Execution of Article VI of the Armistice of November 11, 1918) remain in force. The notice to be given to the German Government of the exercise of the right of substitution accorded by paragraphs 7 and 8 shall be such as the Reparation Commission may consider sufficient. If the Commission shall determine that the full exercise of the foregoing options would interfere unduly with the industrial requirements of Germany, the Commission is authorised to postpone or cancel deliveries, and in so doing to settle all questions of priority; but the coal to replace coal from destroyed mines shall receive priority over other deliveries.

"ANNEX VI.

"This option shall be exercised within sixty days of the receipt by the Commission of such particulars as to stocks as may be considered necessary by the Commission.

"2.

"Germany further accords to the Reparation Commission an option to require delivery during the period from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty until January 1, 1920, and during each period of six months thereafter until January 1, 1925, of any specified kind of dyestuff and chemical drug up to an amount not exceeding 25 per cent. of the German production of such dyestuffs and chemical drugs during the previous six months period. If in any case the production during such previous six months was, in the opinion of the Commission, less than normal, the amount required may be 25 per cent. of the normal production.

"Such option shall be exercised within four weeks after the receipt of such particulars as to production and in such form as may be considered necessary by the Commission; these particulars shall be furnished by the German Government immediately after the expiration of each six months period.

"3.

"For dyestuffs and chemical drugs delivered under paragraph 1, the price shall be fixed by the Commission having regard to pre-war net export prices and to subsequent increases of cost.

"For dyestuffs and chemical drugs delivered under paragraph 2, the price shall be fixed by the Commission having regard to pre-war next export prices and subsequent variations of cost, or the lowest net selling price of similar dyestuffs and chemical drugs to any other purchaser.

"4.

"All details, including mode and times of exercising the options, and making delivery, and all other questions arising under this arrangement shall be determined by the Reparation Commission; the German Government will furnish to the Commission all necessary information and other assistance which it may require.

"5.

"The cost of such liabilities under the above heads so far as they relate to purchases or requisitions by the Allied and Associated Governments in the occupied territories shall be paid by the German Government to the Allied and Associated Governments in marks at the current or agreed rate of exchange. All other of the above costs shall be paid in gold marks.

"Article 251.

"(2) A portion of the debt as it stood on August 1, 1914, of the German State to which the ceded territory belonged, to be determined in accordance with the principle stated above.

"Such portions shall be determined by the Reparation Commission.

"Article 260.

"Without prejudice to the renunciation of any rights by Germany on behalf of herself or of her nationals in the other provisions of the present Treaty, the Reparation Commission may within one year from the coming into force of the present Treaty demand that the German Government become possessed of any rights and interests of German nationals in any public utility undertaking or in any concession operating in Russia, China, Turkey, Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria, or in the possessions or dependencies of the States or in any territory formerly belonging to Germany or her allies, to be ceded by Germany or her allies to any Power or to be administered by a Mandatory under the present Treaty, and may require that the German Government transfer, within six months of the date of demand, all such rights and interests and any similar rights and interests the German Government may itself possess to the Reparation Commission.

"Germany shall be responsible for indemnifying her nationals so dispossessed, and the Reparation Commission shall credit Germany, on account of sums due for reparation, with such sums in respect of the value of the transferred rights and interests as may be assessed by the Reparation Commission, and the German Government shall, within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, communicate to the Reparation Commission all such rights and interests, whether already granted, contingent or not yet exercised, and shall renounce on behalf of itself and its nationals in favour of the Allied and Associated Powers all such rights and interests which have not been so communicated.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, October 18, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, we hail with joy and gratitude this a newborn day, token of Thy presence, good will, and continued care.

Help us with pure minds, high ideals, and noble endeavors to hallow Thy name, trusting where we can not prove in a faithful service to our fellow men; ever advancing with a strong heart, a firm step, a helping hand, a sunny smile, a cheering voice, until we all come into the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ and Thy kingdom be come and Thy will be done in the hearts of all men, under the potent influence of the world's great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 230. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare and issue a supplementary report on the condition of the cotton crop.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 55. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust disputes or claims by entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States against the United States and between each other arising from faulty surveys in townships 29 south, range 28 east; also in townships 36, 37, and 38 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, in the State of Florida, and for other purposes; and

S. 794. An act granting lands for school purposes in Government town sites on reclamation projects.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—THE BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Under the rule upon which we are now operating of 12 hours' debate, what is the order of business on next Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the rule the rule makes this bill (H. R. 9783) privileged for next Monday.

Mr. GARD. The present bill is privileged for next Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, has the Chair considered the rule? I am not going to appeal from the decision of the Chair, but it has been my understanding that the only way to get rid of the unanimous consent and suspension of the rules day was by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that the rule makes this bill privileged next Monday, but, of course, the House can set that aside.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, the Chair held that Calendar Wednesday would not be set aside by this rule.

The SPEAKER. No; Calendar Wednesday would not be set aside.

Mr. DOWELL. What is the difference between the order of business on next Monday and the order of business on Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that upon investigation the gentleman will find that the rule is quite different as to Calendar Wednesday and the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The Chair thinks that it would be in order for the gentleman from Iowa to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on this bill, but the House can vote it down, and in such case the Unanimous Consent Calendar would be in order.

Mr. GARD. My inquiry was whether the Speaker would hold that the rule would authorize this bill to go ahead on Monday to the exclusion of the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair this rule gives a privileged status to this bill, so that it is superior to that of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and the Chair would recognize the gentleman from Iowa to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on this bill. Then if that was voted down, the Unanimous Consent Calendar would come up, so that it would be in the power of the House to exercise its option.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reinforce the opinion of the Chair by suggesting that there is a provision in the rule that this shall be a continuing order. That is not usually in the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had that in view.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for me to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it is his intention to go ahead with this bill on next Monday?

Mr. GOOD. I hope to. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9783.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9783, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing, as I think all other members of the Committee on the Budget are, to permit anyone who desires to speak against this bill at this time, because we have already had half a dozen very able speeches in favor of the bill, and no one thus far has said anything in opposition to it. But if no one wants to oppose the measure at this time I will merely make a few very general observations as to the work of your committee, and possibly during the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule I may go into some of the provisions more in detail.

I feel that this is a bill that every Member of the House ought to give some careful personal attention to. If there ever was a bill that the Members ought to individually study and take the hearings and read them, this is the bill.

As most of you know, this Select Committee on the Budget has held hearings on the subject for over two weeks. We had some of the most distinguished people in this Republic before us. We were especially honored by the high class of people who favored us with their views and the marvelous amount of practical information that the committee thus obtained. Every Member of this House should, in justice to himself, read the patriotic and excellent statement of ex-President Taft. It is one of the most practical, sensible, and far-reaching and human presentations of this matter that anyone could make.

Let me say to my Republican friends that while this is not a political matter at all, with ex-President Taft, former Secretary of War Stimson, Gov. Lowden of Illinois, MONDELL, and many other high-class men urging the Republican Party to take this matter up at once and get the greater portion of the very great credit for putting it on the statute books, I can not see how anyone on that side of the House can justly oppose as fair, reasonable, just, and necessary a measure as this is. And let me say to my Democratic friends that if we meant what we said in our national platform of 1916; if President Wilson meant what he said in his message to Congress in December, 1917; if Secretary McAdoo and Secretary Glass and John Fitzgerald and Swagar Sherley knew what they were talking about—and everyone knows they did—then I can not see how any Democrat can consistently come out and oppose this measure.

This proposition is, in a legislative way, naturally divided into two parts, and we have presented the subject to the House in two separate bills. The bill that is now before the House has nothing whatever to do with this House itself. This bill pertains solely to the executive department of the Government. It pertains to the President of the United States and the 10 departments over which his Secretaries preside. This bill is intended to systematize and regulate the expenditures of all those departments and make the President himself responsible for them.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. KING. What reason had the committee for bringing in this legislation on the floor of the House in installments?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. For the reason that the legislation necessary to create a national budget system is logically divided into two parts. In the first place, we have to have a law creating a budget system and providing who shall make up the budget, and how it shall be made, and what it shall contain; that is, the formation of the budget. That is the first thing, and that must be provided for by a law, and that is what this bill does. The second phase of the budget is the action by Congress on the budget prepared and presented to it by the administrative branch of the Government. The third phase of the budget is the supervision and control of the execution of the budget. The first and third steps are matters of law, and this bill provides for both of them. The second step, the action on the budget by Congress, is to be governed merely by a change in the rules of our House and does not require any law or any action by the Senate. Now, the budget must come from the executive and the administrative departments; and instead of giving all this power and putting all this responsibility upon the Treasury Department, as some people thought we should, we felt that there was nobody but the President of the United States who ought to be responsible absolutely for the fiscal and economic policy and system of our Government. Therefore we placed this duty upon the President of the United States, and we make him officially responsible for the budget and for all of his executive departments, for all the money that Congress must raise, and for the way in which it shall be raised and how it shall all be spent. This bill deals only with the executive—that is, the administrative—features, the first and third phases of this proposed budgetary legislation. There is a great deal of machinery that has to be arranged for by law. We create a bureau of the budget and provide for its officials, and define their duties and require the departments to submit their estimates to the President instead of to the Treasury. This bill provides the action that is required by the President as to when he shall transmit the budget to Congress, also the contents, order, and arrangement of the estimates of appropriations and the complete machinery for the guidance of the President, and for the budget bureau and the various departments, and for the accounting department and its procedure. If this bill does not pass, then there is no necessity for considering the next step—that is, the action by Congress on the budget—because there will be no budget and no necessity to discuss a change of our rules. But if this bill does pass—I am confident it will—and is signed by the President—I am confident it will be—then we should follow it up by the resolution pertaining to change in our own rules of this House. In other words, we have no logical right to pass a very emphatic law regulating the executive departments of the Government unless we are willing to regulate ourselves in the same direction of economic coordination. But we will determine that matter when we get to it. Our own rules for our own conduct are not at all involved in this bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I asked the question yesterday about the hearings that might be conducted after the budget was submitted. Is it the plan to have whatever hearings may be had conducted before a single committee in the House, or will the hearings be divided among the various committees, as they are now, the Military Affairs Committee conducting the hearings with reference to military appropriations and the Naval Affairs Committee with reference to naval appropriations?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is no question whatever but that all of these appropriating committees will function the same hereafter as they have heretofore, because one big committee can not conduct all of the hearings. At the same time there will be taken from them only the right of making the appropriations. They can recommend, they can authorize, they can bring in and pass laws, they can provide for the laws applicable to these departments, regulate salaries, and do everything under the sun, practically, that they can at the present time, except to appropriate the money. We felt that there must be some big central committee, and while the House will hereafter determine it, it is possible that the ranking member and the chairman of each of these appropriation committees, the Military and Naval Affairs and all the other appropriating committees, may be members of this large expenditure committee of 35. But, of course, seven or eight appropriating committees will have their investigations and duties to perform just the same. The idea is that there must be some centralized recognized power that can put a brake upon all of these committees, and morally at least on the House itself, and not let one committee run wild in one direction and another committee run wild in another direction, and have no systematic check on any of them. Each of these is naturally ambitious to get as much as it possibly can. There is no economic financial system or cohesive control to our present methods of obtaining estimates or expending the money.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it planned to have the budget presented en masse to the House?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Or will it be submitted separately?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It will be submitted en masse to the House and considered systematically and consecutively as the great national budget, and will be by all odds the most important bill before each Congress, and will probably require weeks to thoroughly consider and pass it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. And the recommendations that are made will be made by one committee?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; one great appropriation committee of 35 will bring the President's budget, with such changes as they agree upon, all at one time, so that it may all be considered at once.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But the various committees will conduct the hearings?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; and they can greatly help that one committee and can also be heard before that committee; but sooner or later, some time, some one big, representative committee will come before this House with the official budget, and that budget will be presented to the House. Then the 435 Members of this House will have the right to shoot it to pieces if they can. They have the same authority and right and permission which they have now to increase or diminish it if they have the votes to do so.

Mr. JONES of Texas. These various committees, as such, will not report any appropriations direct to the House?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They will not make any appropriations; no. They can report laws to the House and they can authorize or recommend appropriations, but they can not appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury. This one committee will have the sole right to do that, and it presents that Federal budget or administration budget to the House with all the various amounts and items that it thinks each of those various departments of the Government is entitled to. We have not taken away from ourselves as Members of Congress, either individually or collectively, a particle of authority to enlarge or cut down or do whatever we please with the administration budget. But at the same time the understanding, the belief, and the hope is that when the administration is politically responsible to the country and when they have the machinery which we give them to do all this work and when they eliminate, as they will, many of the duplications of work and unnecessary clerks and bring in the budget which they are willing to go before the people with and say that the Government imperatively needs and wants that amount of money and does not want any more and will be responsible for the economic expenditure of that amount of money and that they will not ask Congress for any more, then, as I say, it is for the House to consider and act upon that budget, and if the House changes that amount, either raising or lowering it, we must and will take whatever credit or blame that may be attached to it, and the administration will not be responsible for that increase or decrease. We will have to answer to the people for our action and it will not be so easy hereafter to answer for unnecessary expenditures.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That answers the question very thoroughly, but there is one further question which I would like to ask: Does the gentleman think that the one supercommittee, as you might term it, will have a chance to be as familiar with what might be proper with reference to the naval appropriations or the Army appropriations or any one particular thing as would a particular committee that was assigned to the duty of investigating the various functions of a particular department of the Government?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We expect that the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Agriculture and all these other committees will go into the matters pertaining to their departments just as fully as they do now, and we expect them to give this budget committee the benefit of their investigations. Personally I think it might be well for the chairmen and the ranking members of those committees to be members of this large general appropriation committee. They could then see to it that their departments are treated fairly. But that is for the House to hereafter determine.

If we are honest in wanting to hereafter more systematically scrutinize the expenditures of the Government and lighten as much as we can the enormous burdens of taxation, we must make some concessions of some of our individual prerogatives. Somebody has got to have the power to actually economize, and with all of these various appropriation committees running rampant you might say at the present time Congress absolutely can not economize; and as ex-President Taft well says, and all of the other thoughtful people say, it is not fair, it is not honest, it is not consistent, it is not practical for us to drastically regulate the administration and then not be willing to regulate ourselves any. But as I have repeatedly said, that matter will be discussed more in detail when we reach it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I desire to thank the gentleman for the information, and I want to assure him that I asked the question for information and for information only.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am in favor of a budget, and always have been, and always will be. I want to ask this question: If no one except this big committee of 35 or 175, or whatever the number may be, is going to make appropriations, then what sense is there in having the Military Affairs Committee and the Naval Affairs Committee and all of the rest of them conduct these hearings? How would the result of the hearing ever get to this big committee?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, the Members could go before the big committee and be given full hearings before this big Appropriations Committee. If the budget is properly and carefully prepared, as it undoubtedly will be, there will not be as much necessity for elaborate hearings. But every committee can conduct as many hearings as it wants to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is true, what is the use of going through this dumb show of having hearings before these various other committees?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, these other committees have a great many duties to perform besides making appropriations of money.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but the hearings are held for the purpose of ascertaining as to how large these appropriations ought to be.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; and somebody has got to make that investigation, and they can do it more thoroughly and give more time to it than a subcommittee from this big committee of 35.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does the big committee get possession of the information that these ordinary committees obtain which now appropriate?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They get it from the budget bureau. The President must furnish it with his budget, and in addition to that the big committee will have all those department heads before it, and likely the chairman and ranking member of these committees will or may be members of this committee, and, if so, would give it all the data necessary for their respective committees.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They would have to state over again to this big committee precisely what they had heard in this smaller committee?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, well, that would be only as to the sum total of the necessary appropriations that they had agreed upon. While it is probably the most important one, yet appropriating money is only one of the many functions of these appropriation committees. Of course, the gentleman understands that this matter is going to be debated at length when that resolution comes up. We have not seen fit to take it up now for two or three reasons. In the first place, this bill must go ahead of it and become a law first, if it is going to pass. And, in the second place, we have not the time to consider it now. And, in the third place, it is not expected we could take it up at this session of Congress at all. This is the bill we are now trying to pass. When we pass this bill and it is approved by the President, then we will, as soon as the House can, take up the rule in relation to making whatever changes the House deems necessary in our own House rules. But we have faithfully promised the American people to pass this bill, or some such a bill, and this is our duty now, and after we do pass this bill then it will be our duty to, and I am confident we will, make whatever changes may be necessary in our rules to keep faith with our party-platform promises.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman has mentioned the fact that this proposed change in the rules making an appropriating committee of 35 would have upon it the chairman and the ranking member of the present appropriating committees of the House?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the House will probably make that kind of a provision in the change of the rules, but it is not in the resolution now. The members of the Select Committee on the Budget have talked that feature over among themselves, but of course it is for the House to determine that. We did not.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. As I understand the proposed change in the rules they do not go that far.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. They do not include the men who only have the right to be upon one of the committees——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The committee on committees of the House may determine that. That is a matter for the House regulation, that is a matter of detail hereafter. We leave that feature to the judgment of the House when the time comes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; but the proposed change does not provide that Representatives from these appropriating committees shall be on this large Appropriation Committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. We felt that the Membership of the House should be left free to determine that by permanent rules of the House, or by the steering committee or whatever committee we want to have to determine that matter.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. May I also inquire if it is the plan to place upon this committee of 35 a rather strong representation from the Committee on Ways and Means of the House?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir. I think so. But of course that also is for the House to hereafter determine.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So that this committee of 35 would have on it representatives from the present appropriating committees of the House and also from the committee that raises revenue?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir. I think the intention is to have that large committee composed of the oldest and strongest Members of the House, representing, of course, all parts of the country.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That would make it fairly representative, then, of the whole House?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes. We have thrashed this out, I may say to the gentleman, exhaustively, and the men who have given this subject a life study have been before us, and they and we have thought over this matter in view of our form of government, and this is our best determination and this report on this bill is unanimous, and I may say there is no minority report on the other one—that is, the resolution changing the rules of the House—although there are some mental reservations of members of the committee as to the system by which we will regulate ourselves when we reach that time. I want to urge every Member to read the report on this bill prepared by our chairman [Mr. GOOD]. It is a very exceptionally clear and forcible presentation of this bill in all its phases.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. In connection with the change in the rules, this thought has occurred to me and on that I shall be very glad to hear the gentleman: If you leave the several committees—the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs, Post Office and Post Roads, Foreign Affairs, and so forth—all the legislative power that they now possess and simply take from them only appropriating authority, the authority to report appropriations, will it, in the gentleman's opinion, work economy, in view of the fact that you leave the authorizing authority with these committees? In other words, if the gentleman will indulge me——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly; go ahead.

Mr. GARRETT. As I understand, under the rule that has been reported, I believe, from the Budget Committee——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. And ought to have been referred to the Committee on Rules, I think; however, I am perfectly willing for the Budget Committee to wrestle with it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say they considered that very fully and finally decided to allow Mr. GOOD to report it rather than Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas.

Mr. GARRETT. So I heard. Now, the authority to authorize, for instance, battleships, cruisers, and all of the naval program is left with the Committee on Naval Affairs under this rule.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, will it not result in the practical working that this committee will simply come in with its authorization of a naval program, and the Committee on Appropriations, if the Congress shall adopt that authorization, will be in honor bound to make the appropriations required under the law, and will it not simply result that your Committee on Naval Affairs and Committee on Military Affairs, and so on, will legislate, having only the responsibility of authorization without the added responsibility of appropriation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I feel, in deference to the chairman of our Budget Committee, that he ought to answer that question.

Mr. GOOD. In answer to the gentleman, I think that is necessarily so. We have a great many committees that report out legislation; that legislation may subsequently require appropriation. Now, take the instance the gentleman has indicated. The Committee on Naval Affairs would and should investigate as to how large a Navy we should have; whether it would be necessary to build one battleship, or two battleships, or a half dozen battleships.

They will investigate into the necessities of the Navy and the size of the Navy. This committee would report all such legislation. No one committee could at the same time look into all the necessities of all the branches of the Government and determine how much should be appropriated and also report all legislation. If that were not the case, the gentleman can see then that there would be no necessity for having all of these appropriation committees and all of these committees of the House that would report out the legislation. But the only intention is to center the finances, the act of financing all of these different activities, in one committee, so that early in the Congress there can be placed before the House on a chart the anticipated revenues for the year and the expected expenditures for the year, that Congress could have the picture at the beginning of the Congress instead of the next day after Congress adjourns, when the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the ranking minority Member have their speeches printed in the RECORD, as has been the custom for a great many years, and Members know the next day after Congress adjourns what the picture is.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it not a fact that the Appropriations Committee up to 1885 was the only committee that had the power to appropriate?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; after its creation had sole jurisdiction. Originally the Ways and Means Committee had appropriating jurisdiction, and that continued until 1865.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So that the distributing of appropriation power among committees is of comparatively recent origin.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman permit just one question? The Appropriations Committee, as I understand it, will have nothing to do with the policy of the Navy or with the policy of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. That would still be determined by these committees?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely.

Mr. DOWELL. And the Appropriations Committee will merely, so far as the appropriations are concerned, carry out the general policy outlined by the other committees?

Mr. GOOD. The only qualification, of course, that would have to be made would be that if we had four billions to expend and the estimate of expenditures amounted to six billions, there would have to be a cut if it was determined not to look to other sources of revenue. So there might be necessarily some cut that might in a way affect the policies, which would be temporary rather than permanent.

Mr. DOWELL. But there would be no disposition whatever on the part of the Appropriations Committee to determine the general policy?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no; I do not think so at all.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if in his opinion the enactment of the present bill into law would make it necessary for the passage of House resolution 324 amending the rules?

Mr. GOOD. No; it would not. The two stand separate and alone. The committee felt this, that here were defects in our present law that ought to be corrected; that we ought to change the law in the respect provided for in the bill.

It also had brought so clearly before it by 37 men who appeared before the committee, that the House ought to change its rules, too, that while we should clean the executive house we ought to clean our own, and the committee was not willing to take the responsibility and say that we would clean the executive house and will not clean our own so as to bring about economy. We brought out both of these measures and have laid the cards all on the table so that the House might determine just what it should do.

Mr. ALMON. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], I believe, that it was contemplated that if this bill now under consideration was enacted into law and House resolution 324 was enacted into law that it would be the purpose to make the membership on the Committee on Appropriations 35, to consist of the present members, numbered 21, and the ranking members from about seven committees, who, having jurisdiction of appropriations, do not make 35, and also suggested a number of members would be taken from the Ways and Means Committee. I do not understand how you could get all those members on a committee of 35. I would like to have the gentleman's views on that.

Mr. GOOD. So far as I am personally concerned, I think this selection of a committee of 35 ought to be from the very strongest men of the House. My own thought is, so far as I am personally concerned, that I shall place in the hands of the committee on committees a letter stating to the committee that my resignation as a member of the Committee on Appropriations is at their disposal, to deal with as to them may seem best. I think the Committee on Ways and Means, that selects the Democratic members of that committee, and the committee on committees, on the Republican side, that selects Republican members, ought to be unfettered, because the big problem before the country for the next 25 years is going to be economy, and you have got to have men upon that committee who are willing to stand against all local demands from the various districts and report out appropriations only that are necessary in order that the Government may economize. I do not know how that would be met by that committee, but I believe by that time the House will be sobered, so that it will be willing to "go to the mat" and select the very best men in the House, men who will stand for economy at all times and under all circumstances.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. GOOD. I have not the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, the gentleman can give the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] some more time.

Did not you and I and some of the rest of us find out here the other day that this House was not in favor of economy?

Mr. GOOD. Well, I have seen the House change in that respect, and I believe it is going to be more and more in favor of economy as the days and years pass and as the Members hear from home.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman was speaking a while ago about the status of the Naval Affairs Committee after the passage of this bill. Would not the status of that committee after the passage of the bill be the same as the present status of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in that they authorize appropriations?

Mr. GOOD. The passage of the bill does not change the status of a single committee of the House. It does not change the power or authority of a single committee or of a single Member of Congress. It is the resolution No. 324.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I refer to the resolution. Under that the status of the Committee on Naval Affairs would be the same as the present status of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. They could authorize, but not appropriate.

Mr. GOOD. They could determine the policy and would decide on the size of the Navy, and then the Committee on Appropriations would have to make the appropriations for it.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I would say, however, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is an appropriating committee at the present time a good deal more than an authorizing committee.

Mr. ALMON. But the passage of this resolution No. 324 amending the rules would not affect the present membership of the Committee on Appropriations, would it?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know whether I caught the point of the gentleman's question or not.

Mr. ALMON. I say the passage of resolution No. 324, changing the membership of the Committee on Appropriations and enlarging it from 21 to 35 members, would not affect the membership of the present committee?

Mr. GOOD. Not unless they tendered their resignations.

Mr. ALMON. Not unless they did that?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I may say to the chairman of the Budget Committee that I am very glad indeed to have had him answer all these questions, because he is so well qualified to do so. I have no pride of opinion or desire to make a speech on this subject. All the members of the committee are unanimously and enthusiastically in favor of this bill. We want to pass it and do everything that will help the passage of it. We have done so much work upon this matter and are so thoroughly impressed with its far-reaching importance that we feel a patriotic pride in this bill and an earnest desire to be of whatever service we can in enacting it into law.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I want to ask the gentleman as to the first section of the bill. I note that there will be a director at $10,000 and an assistant director at $7,500, to be appointed by the President.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOON. And then you have some $5,000 men and some with less salary.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MOON. What is the tenure of office of these men?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The tenure of office of the director and assistant director of the bureau is at the will of the President.

Mr. MOON. You do not say so at all. It is simply provided that the President appoints them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The President can appoint them, and they are subject to his control. My idea is that the power to appoint implies the power to remove. I think the President could put them out any minute.

Mr. MOON. The bill does not say that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; but those two men, the director and assistant director, are not under civil service and they are intended to be subject to the control of the President. But the other officers who are appointed later in the bill—that is, the comptroller general and assistant comptroller general of the accounting department—are subject to removal only by the Congress of the United States. The President appoints them, but thereafter he has no control whatever over them. They were intended to be made entirely independent of the President and all the executive departments of the Government. They are responsible only to Congress.

Mr. MOON. They are under civil service?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. The comptroller general and the assistant comptroller general can not be considered as being under civil service, because they are subject to removal only by the House and Senate, for three causes only.

Mr. MOON. All the employees whose salaries are less than $5,000, it is provided, shall be appointed from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission. They are under the civil-service rules?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Then, to get down to facts, you have a life tenure for everything, practically?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no. The director and assistant director of the budget bureau hold office only at the will of the President. All the employees of the bureau under them are under the civil service, and in the same way the comptroller general and assistant hold office subject to the will of Congress, and all the subordinate employees in that accounting department are under the civil service.

Mr. MOON. You do not provide for removing anybody. You provide for appointments, but not for removals.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes. If the Senate and the House of Representatives decide in their judgment by a majority vote that the comptroller general or the assistant is inefficient or guilty of neglect of duty or of malfeasance in office, they can throw him out very quickly, and they will not hesitate to do so.

Mr. MOON. You can throw out anybody by impeachment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say this to the gentleman from Tennessee: Our idea was that in some manner we should make these responsible head officers, having such tremendous powers and responsibilities, as independent as possible under our form of Government, and should get as high a class of men as possible, and then give them the powers similar to what such officers have in other countries of the world and allow them to fearlessly cut down and cut out all the thousands of unnecessary expenditures of our Government. They should be absolutely free and independent of official influences. They will have to be cold-blooded and cut down appropriations in every direction that they deem proper and eliminate duplication and any superfluous employees and antiquated methods and antiquated people and inaugurate efficiency and up-to-date business methods, and they have very great and far-reaching responsibilities, and they must have a free hand to properly perform their very great duties.

Mr. MOON. Is not that the way the rights and prerogatives of the people are committed to a clique for plunder?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no. We want to get away from that.

Mr. MOON. You have made no provision here for any term of years in the tenure of office of these men.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No, sir.

Mr. MOON. They practically hold for life. You say they are appointed by the President. You do not provide for their removal by the President. It is a question whether the President can remove them or not.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; the President can remove the director, and if it is deemed advisable to insert that specific provision in the bill directly giving him that authority, I see no objection to doing so.

Mr. MOON. But the President can not remove the civil-service employees.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield there?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In reference to the two officials to whom the gentleman has referred—that is, to the director and assistant director of the budget—the bill provides that they shall be appointed by the President.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, there is no definite fixed term of office, and an incoming President will have a perfect right, or the President who makes the appointment will have the right, to call for and demand their resignations whenever he desires to do so, because they hold subject to his will and pleasure.

Mr. MOON. Ought there not to be a tenure fixed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. There should not be a term fixed in the case of these officials, but they should be subject to removal at pleasure, and for this reason: We are trying in this bill to fix a definite responsibility upon the President in the transmission of these estimates. The President has not the time, and it would be impossible for him to go through these departments and get definite information as to the amount of these appropriations and the number of employees required, and therefore we provide this bureau for that purpose. Now, if we are fixing upon the President the responsibility for the transmission of these estimates, certainly we ought to give the President free rein in the selection of the man who is to head that bureau. He ought to be a man in whom the President has absolute confidence, and the President ought to have the right at any minute and in any hour to remove him if he desires to do so.

Mr. MOON. Well, admitting that, it is a very questionable proposition—the gentleman's statement—as a matter of law. If the appointment is placed in the hands of the President with the power of removal, there is no question about it; but if Congress invests in the President simply the power of naming a particular officer, it is very questionable to say whether the President has the right to say what the tenure is to be and remove him from office.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Section 12 provides for that.

Mr. MOON. What does it provide?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. It provides that the President shall remove him and fix the tenure of office.

Mr. MOON. I am only making these suggestions to the gentleman. I do not believe there should be any doubt at all as to the power of the President. I do not believe we ought to create an office without fixing the tenure, and I do not believe one iota in the civil-service proposition you have here. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would not the status of this director be the same as that of an ambassador, who is appointed for a fixed term?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And that is the custom always in the Diplomatic Service—that when a new President is inaugurated he receives the resignations of all the ambassadors and ministers. This is on precisely the same basis.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; and in the same way.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In a moment. In the same way, if the director of the budget and his assistant have been exceptionally efficient and have made a splendid record, as we all hope and believe they will, the chances are that no incoming President will want to remove them. He ought to have that power. He does have that power under this bill; but if those officials are exceptionally efficient he will not want to dispense with their services. They are not political positions at all.

Mr. MOON. Why do you not make it clear that he shall have the power?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. So far as I am concerned, I have not a particle of objection to that. That is a matter of detail, to be considered when we come to consider the bill under the five-minute rule for amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman says the new President, when he comes in, could remove the director.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Could the President who was in, during the term of his office, remove the director?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, surely he can remove him. If he does not prove efficient, the President can and will remove him at any time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there is any doubt about that, it ought to be made clear.

Mr. MOON. What time does your bill provide for the retirement of these people on half pay?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. At the age of 70 years. That only applies to two men.

Mr. MOON. That is exactly the provision as to judges who may be appointed by the President, but can not be unappointed by the President.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is a matter of detail. I hope the gentleman will offer an amendment to embody any suggestion which he has in mind.

Mr. MOON. I am against any proposition that turns over control of the revenues to any such a bureau as that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. On page 9 of the bill it says that section 236 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

SEC. 236. All claims and demands whatever by the United States or against them, and all accounts whatever in which the United States are concerned, either as debtors or creditors, shall be settled and adjusted in the accounting department.

What claims does that cover? What does it mean by "settled"? Does it mean that they shall be paid, or drawn on the Treasury and settled? What class of claims does that refer to? Does that relieve Congress of any of these private claims that come before it, and does it relieve the Court of Claims of any of its work?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think so. I think that simply means to consolidate all of these five or six auditors that we now have into one department and put them under the Comptroller General and make them go into one office rather than have each one of them auditing his own accounts, which is an entirely illogical and unbusinesslike way of doing and which they are doing at the present time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I agree with the gentleman about that, but it seems to me that the word "settled" may have a different meaning than he states.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We do not bring out this bill as the absolute sum total of human wisdom. When you come to consider it, section by section, we will all welcome amendments that will make it better.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it the purpose of this legislation that when the budget committee has reported a bill to the House the power of the House to increase those appropriations is shut off?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no. The House can do whatever it pleases. We do not take away from this House any power, and we do not take away from any of the Members the power to try to do something; but we feel this way, that when the administration brings in a carefully prepared budget and says to the American people, "This is all the money we want, this is where we are going to get it from, this is what we are going to expend it for, this is our official fiscal policy," and when it has been carefully considered and reported by the large House Appropriations Committee, which may be called its budget committee, our thought is that they will very thoroughly investigate, and that after the items making up this budget have gone through all these different departments and bureaus and the comptroller and the various committees, when a bill is brought in here after that much consideration, the chances are that that bill will not be increased in this House.

In other words, we feel that it will at least somewhat resemble the effect of the official budget that is put before the House of Commons of England or other controlling bodies of the various nations of the world. In other words, it is possible; but we figure that with the character of men that we will have in the 35 members of that committee, and with the investigation they make, and with the power of the executive departments behind it, a bill will not be changed very much on the floor of the House unless there is some very good reason for it. Candidly that is the way the Budget Committee feels.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that under our form of government and under our Constitution it would be impossible to put a limitation on appropriations by the House?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think it is impossible; but at the same time we doubt the wisdom of it. We do not think any such limitations will be necessary.

Let me say this generally to the Members of the House: The only one feature that has a mental reservation with all of us, and that is somewhat uncertain in the minds of all of us, and that we can not satisfactorily advise you about, is the body at the other end of this Capitol.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will take 10 minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As a matter of fact, the House of Representatives has got no right to regulate the Senate, but we do feel that when we bring out the budget in the manner in which we here provide, and if we provide that any amendments that they put on in the Senate shall be subject to a point of order in this House, and guard ourselves in every way that we can, we feel that with the administration and with the power that this House will have of initiating these revenue measures, it will very materially curtail the present custom of the Senate of boosting appropriation bills to the blue sky, nearly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should like to know how the committee construes section 4, particularly that portion of it which gives to the President the recommendation as to revenues. Is this budget, in addition to suggestions as to appropriations, to contain suggestions for the imposition or raising of revenues?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why, yes; in so far as the President sees fit to advise Congress. In other words, we want to put the duty and the responsibility upon the President of the United States to outline and present to Congress, as we feel he ought to, the fiscal policy of this Government; in other words, to show how and where the money is coming from and where he thinks every dollar of it ought to go. In other words, we want to make him put all his financial cards on the table here and before the whole country and be officially responsible for them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. For instance, take the case of this year, where the total expenses for the fiscal year exceeds the sources of revenue from all known sources by more than $3,000,000,000. Would it be the duty under this plan for the President to recommend to Congress how that deficit can be made up?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, absolutely. He ought to tell Congress what his financial policy and ideas are, and then, if necessary, go before the American people and back them up. If we differ with him and change his budget, we will have to answer to our constituents when we go home for reelection.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will allow me, that is the law now, under the act of March 4, 1909.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Since I have been in Congress I have never heard of its being obeyed. Does the gentleman from Iowa remember a case where the President has made such a recommendation?

Mr. GOOD. No; I think it may be that President Wilson, in one of his annual messages, made some suggestion during the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; such as a few sources of taxation, but no recommendation as to those taxes. He recommended that this tax should be imposed, for instance, on oil and steel.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think that President Taft or President Wilson ever carried out that act or enforced that law. It has been practically a dead letter, and still it is a good law.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand the purpose of making this provision is to make it the duty of the President to make suggestions and recommendations as to revenue and recommendations as to expenditure?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; we feel that he ought to frankly and fully let the country know what his policy is. He will have the necessary machinery, and he should do the work and give the country the benefit of his power and opportunity to save the people's money and get the credit for it if he does and be blamed for it if he does not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In other words, the budget is, so far as the Executive is concerned, a complete recommendation to Congress as to the finances of the Government?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Absolutely. In other words, we put the responsibility on the executive departments of this Government to tell Congress and the American people what that financial policy is and how to carry out what he promised during the campaign, what his party stands for, and present it to the American people in a way that everybody can understand. Then Congress will take up his recommendations, and we have the absolute power to indorse them or disregard them. If we disregard them we have to answer to the American people for it, whether we raise or lower it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. As I understand, the Budget Committee prepares in detail the budget and transmits it to Congress through the President, stating the various sums that will be necessary to run the Government——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; and where they are to come from.

Mr. HASTINGS. And where they are to come from—the amount to be used by the Navy Department, the amount to be used by the Army, the Agriculture Department——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Every activity of the Government.

Mr. HASTINGS. Every activity of the Government, and give it in detail. What I would like to hear the gentleman on is this: I am for the budget and for the bill; but I am against the rule, because I believe when these recommendations are made, for instance, the amount necessary for the Army or the Navy or the Department of Agriculture—I believe that gentlemen of this House who have made a study of that question for years and years are better qualified to say how that appropriation shall be used for the benefit of the Army or other departments than the 35 Members on this committee. I believe that gentlemen, for illustration, on the Post Office Committee who have been on that committee for years and years know more about the expenditure of that money for the benefit of the Postal Service than the men on this committee. I believe that men on the Agricultural Committee will know more about the expenditure of money for the benefit of agriculture than this great committee, and so of all the other departments. That is the one point of difference between myself and the gentleman, and the difference entertained by other Members of the House. Everybody favors a budget system.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma what would happen to the country if all the members of the Post Office Committee should be defeated for reelection?

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman from Massachusetts understands that that is highly improbable. Some gentlemen have served here as long as 30 years, some 35, and some 40 years, and there is never an entirely new membership of the House. Let me say that just as soon as you concentrate the power in 35 Members of the House, the Appropriation Committee, the Committee on Rules, and the Ways and Means Committee will control and dominate the legislation of this House, and the rest of the membership of this House might as well go home.

Mr. WALSH. They could resign.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman from Massachusetts imagines that he runs the entire House, and often interjects remarks, whether proper or otherwise; and sometimes they are not entirely appreciated, and some do not appreciate them at all. I want him to remember that there are other Members that ought to be heard and expect to be heard once in a while in addition to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have not the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma, who has been here for a great many years——

Mr. HASTINGS. Not many, but a few.

Mr. WALSH. Well, several terms, feel that any one committee or any two committees or any three committees can control the judgment of the entire membership of the House or can get any measure through contrary to the judgment of the majority of the House?

Mr. HASTINGS. They bring the legislation to the attention of the House, and in that way can get consideration of the House. Let me ask the gentleman how the Committee on Agriculture could get any consideration here of any bills before the House, except on Calendar Wednesday or by a special rule? If the committee has had two Calendar Wednesdays, the committee might never be called during the whole session of Congress. We have had experience of that kind a number of times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Might I suggest that up to 1865 there was only one committee of this House, which had charge of not only appropriations but the raising of revenue?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is true.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And many well-known statesmen made handsome reputations, although they were not members of the Ways and Means Committee. It was not until 1885 that any committee except one had the power of appropriation at all.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is not a Member in this House who favors economy or who wants to carry out his party platform who can give a sane reason for voting against this bill.

It is a matter that systematizes the executive departments. As far as the other proposition is concerned—that is, our rules—that is a bridge which we will cross when we come to it. That will be time enough to thrash out the rules question and the power of the committees.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Is it not true that this bill creates quite a number of officers at large salaries?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not very many.

Mr. STEAGALL. Are not those places to be filled by men who are to be appointed and who are not responsible to the people of the country who pay the taxes, from whom the representatives of the people hold their positions?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The heads of the budget are responsible to the President of the United States, and he can cut off their heads in five minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Is it not true that some of these officers hold office for life?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. All civil-service employees hold office for life.

Mr. STEAGALL. Is it not true also that, after all, the Congress is not responsible for extravagant appropriations as are the heads of these departments, to whom we listen and who submit to us now their estimates from which we make up our appropriations?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman is absolutely correct about that. That is one thing that came out in the hearings. Practically all of these writers upon the budget system, even the authors of many books and articles in all of these magazines, berate Congress for extravagance, but when they came before our committee, as a matter of fact, there was hardly one of them who knew that the Congress of the United States had saved to the Government of the United States hundreds of millions of dollars by cutting down estimates that were turned in every year by the heads of the executive departments.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is true that in every instance the Congress cuts the appropriations sent in by these heads of departments.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In almost every instance.

Mr. STEAGALL. Does not the gentleman believe that the representatives of the people, who have to go before them every two years and give an account of their record here, can better be trusted to conserve and economize than men appointed who are not responsible to the people, who hold their office at the will of some one else?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is nothing in this bill that would prevent us from preserving and economizing, and we see no reason why the administration should not be put on record to conserve and economize and let the American people know why it does not, if it does not.

Mr. STEAGALL. Does the gentleman believe that if the Members of Congress could have put the responsibility upon the Executive, it would have resulted in any great saving in recent years?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I think it would. I think there is a great deal of duplication, and many unnecessary employees, and great waste and unnecessary expenditures, and I feel that if the departments themselves had the responsibility put upon them of going before the American people for reelection and showing where all this money came from and went to we would have made a great saving. Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for its courteous hearing. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take up the five minutes in catechizing the chairman of the committee [Mr. GOOD], because I want some information. If the chief man in this plan—whatever he is called—is not to be appointed for life, why not say so in this bill?

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman refer to the director of the budget or the comptroller general?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The comptroller general.

Mr. GOOD. He is not appointed for life. He is appointed during good behavior. He is appointed until the happening of two events—either until he is removed by concurrent resolution of Congress or until he reaches the age of 70 years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is one question. Why do you not put it in the bill that the President shall have the power to remove this man instantly if he wants to?

Mr. GOOD. The intention was that this department should be more an arm of the Congress than of the executive department. The President will have his bureau of the budget, with a director of the budget, and there should be on the part of Congress an independent establishment, to whom Congress could go for its information, which would be at all times a check and a balance against extravagance upon the part of the Executive.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why put the director and his assistant on the same basis as Federal courts—that when they reach the age of 70 years and have served 10 years they shall be retired on half pay?

Mr. GOOD. That does not apply to the director of the budget. The director of the budget, when he retires, gets no pay at all after he leaves the office, because that man is to be the President's personal man. He will likely go out with the administration. He is the man that the President will hold responsible for giving him personal information that he wants. The comptroller general is a semijudicial one. I can conceive of no official of the United States who will have more power than the comptroller general of the United States. We ought to invite to that office the very best talent that is obtainable; and in order to do that you must make the tenure of office somewhat permanent and hold out an inducement to the man who may occupy it, so that when he retires, if he is not retired by concurrent resolution, he will have something on which he will be able to live.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is just the beginning of a pension system from civil walks of life, is it not?

Mr. GOOD. No; I do not think so. The gentleman may say that retiring judges of the Federal court was the beginning of a pension system; yet that law has been on the statute books for a great many years, and it was not the beginning of a pension system, and this bill does not extend it except to this officer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But every time some one wants to establish a pension system from civil life the case of the Federal judges is cited as a precedent.

Mr. GOOD. That is true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why should not another law be passed that if a man serves in Congress 10 years or 25 years or 20 years and attains the age of 70 years, he shall be retired on half pay? What do these appointive officials do, who hold appointive offices, in the way of labor, more than a Congressman does?

Mr. GOOD. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to this fact, that this man will pass upon expenditures of several billions of dollars a year. We ought to get the very best man available. I do not know whether you can get a man from the practice of the law or from business pursuits for the amount specified in the bill; but the intention of the committee was to make the salary so it would be attractive, and also to make some retirement provision attractive. The retirement provision is only an incident; it is a detail; and if there is objection to it on the ground the gentleman has specified, why——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have five minutes more. I am digging for information.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, now, he gets $10,000 a year. We get $7,500. We pass on billions of dollars a year, too. Now, how does he come to be such a big wig? When we come to that section I am going to move to strike out the retirement business and find out about it. Now, another question. Is this comptroller general, or whatever you call him, going to be a member of the Cabinet, with a separate department?

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You refer all the way through the bill to "the department."

Mr. GOOD. Yes. We provide in section 9 that there is created a department to be known as the accounting department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. That is the department that is referred to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, a department has a certain fixed meaning in the understanding of the American people. It is "the department," and the chief of the department is a member of the Cabinet.

Mr. GOOD. Not necessarily so. I can give the gentleman quite a number of instances where departments do not have a Cabinet member.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is a misnomer, then, to call it a department. A department is a department. Does not the gentleman know that the House has been the most economical body that has anything to do with the finances of this country?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; more economical than the estimating or the executive department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The chiefs of departments, the heads of bureaus, and all that kept exceeding the appropriations here until Congress had to pass a law making it a criminal offense for them to do it.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; that is true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this comptroller general, or whoever or whatever he is going to be, supposed to be more economical than the rest of these departments?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely so. This department is created to put a stop to that sort of thing in the executive department, and the only way you can do it is to have men going out through these other departments 365 days in the year to bring to Congress the information as to the real status in those departments. That is, in part, the purpose of this department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, does not the gentleman know that the Civil Service Commission has been hunting around here to find places in which to put—I have forgotten how many, but four or five thousand that some department turned loose here the other day—and the Civil Service Commission stated that they were going to find places to put those discharged people in?

Mr. GOOD. I had not seen that statement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, it was in the newspapers. I do not know whether the newspapers were telling the truth or lying about it.

Mr. GOOD. I have not seen the statement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This comptroller general is going to absorb practically all the power there is up there, is he not?

Mr. GOOD. No; the comptroller general will pass first on the legality of every expenditure. Second, he will audit the accounts in a big way for all of the departments, and he will have under him a trained corps of auditors, who will owe their position to the fact that they are auditors rather than that they have performed political services. Political auditors are now selected. Of the six auditors, only one had ever done any auditing before. The others were men selected because of their political pull, and it is not businesslike for Congress to be held responsible for appropriations and having no check upon the expenditures after they are made. No business institution in the country would give a million dollars to a man to spend for a certain thing and allow him to audit his own accounts. That is the system we have now. We want an independent audit, so that Congress can know whether or not the money it has appropriated has been expended for the purposes for which it was appropriated. And we want him to be able to say it to them without fear of being removed by the executive that he criticizes. That is the purpose of this provision.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Another question. Has a single man appeared to testify before this Committee on the Budget who has standing enough to be elected here to the House or to the Senate in his own community?

Mr. GOOD. Did a single man——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did a single man appear before this Budget Committee and advise a budget—and most of them would not know a budget if they met it in the big road—did a single one have standing enough for him to be elected to the House or the Senate?

Mr. GOOD. Well, Mr. Fitzgerald, Mr. Sherley; both have been elected a number of times to this House and rendered wonderful service in this House, and they both advocated it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Both were able men.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Taft and Gov. Lowden both advocated it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want five minutes more.

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, that I am in favor of a budget system, and this idea of a big committee to transact this business appeals to me very forcibly, but I do not want some office created up here in the administrative department that is going to bully and override the House of Representatives. [Applause.] The patronage of the Government is very strong indeed. I had experiences concerning that early in my congressional career.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. The Comptroller of the Treasury Department now passes upon appropriations as to whether finally it would be legal or illegal to expend the money for the purpose spoken of. A man by the name of Taylor, of Ohio, was comptroller when I came to Washington. He was a very competent man in every respect.

A law came up for him to construe as to the expenditure of an appropriation. Grant was President. Mr. Taylor would not construe it for the purpose proposed. They could not get him to do it. He said that was contrary to the spirit of the law that made the appropriation. Whereupon word came to him that he must make that construction or he would be removed. His reply was, "I tender my resignation to the President, because I will not make that construction." And President Grant had the good sense to let him stay, and he did stay until he died. Now, I want a man that is not to be subject to patronage in the construction of the law that makes the appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When Congress met in extraordinary session in 1893 we had a caucus here, not of Democrats alone but of everybody who was friendly to silver. There was a membership then of 357. There were 201 Members of Congress in that caucus. They debated it two weeks, and when we called the roll seven times on one day on that proposition, 16 to 1 and 17 to 1, and so forth, the highest vote we ever polled was 101. What did it? Patronage.

One night in February, 1909, or early in March, we had a confab here about the President's salary just before President Taft was to be inaugurated. We were scrapping around here as to whether we would raise his salary to $75,000, and it was solemnly promised on the floor of the House if I would let up fighting that proposition the $25,000 for traveling expenses for the President would never be asked any more. The statement was made in public. Within three weeks after President Taft was inaugurated a bill was introduced here to give him that $25,000 for traveling expenses, and I accused gentlemen over there who formerly agreed with me on that proposition that they were not acting in good faith; that they were not telling the truth on that night on which we were scrapping; but they simply laughed at it. They practically admitted that they have fibbed; and President Taft got his $25,000 for traveling expenses.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is a reflection upon the House of Representatives and the Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That may be; but I am telling you about this patronage clause. I could give a dozen examples. As one example that I have related is about a Republican and one about a Democrat, nobody can accuse me of talking politics. I am in favor of a budget system, but I am not in favor of giving some Mephistopheles up in these departments authority to do everything.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my part in this debate is to discuss the English financial system and procedure in relation to the preparation, submission, and adoption of their yearly budget, and to state in what respects we adopted or rejected their practice, in order to propose a budget system adapted to American conditions. The committee prepared the pending bill, having in mind our constitutional system, our institutions, and circumstances.

It is well understood by everyone who has studied the budget system that the English practice is the best of its kind and the longest established; it has been under fire and test for a great many years, and it is probably better known than any other.

Charles Dickens, in David Copperfield, says:

> Mr. Micawber conjured me to observe that if a man had £20 a year for his income and spent 19 shillings and 6 pence he would be happy, but if he spent £20 1s. he would be miserable; after which he borrowed a shilling from me for porter and cheered up.

That, in a way, describes the condition in this country. That is, we have had during our history such ample resources that we were not compelled to worry at any time concerning the revenue necessary to meet the expenditures. And our debt was small in proportion to our ability to obtain funds for the support of the Government. Suddenly we have come to a condition of affairs where our revenues are not adequate for our expenditures, where our debt has suddenly assumed tremendous proportions, where the costs of the Government have increased and will be largely maintained for a considerable period, and where, when we return to normal times and conditions, the incomes of the people who are paying these great taxes will be reduced. It will then be a greater burden on the taxpayers to pay even the amount that they are now paying. We are faced, then, with three conditions, namely, increased debt, increased expenditure, and decreasing sources of revenue in comparison with governmental expenditures.

For instance, take the question of the increase in salaries. We have made increases in salaries, and it is proposed to increase many others. The number of persons employed will be reduced slowly. There are many obligations growing out of the war, the full extent of which we have not realized. Very many other expenses of the Government that have been increased will likewise diminish slowly. We have not yet had time to take stock of the full extent of our new liabilities.

We have had in this country many issues in times past between the different parties, but in my judgment the great issue for many years to come will be the question of financial retrenchment—the reduction of expenditures. I expect to see in this country a great President, who, like Mr. Gladstone, will found his title to fame and lasting glory as President of the American Republic upon the fact that he conducted the administrative affairs of this Government upon a basis of sound economy and obtained the results that ought to be obtained at a greatly reduced expense [applause]; that there will be a race of Secretaries in the Cabinet who will make it their great endeavor to so conduct their departments in an orderly, systematic, and less expensive manner, who will go through them with a lighted candle and discover where eliminations can be made and found their title to the gratitude of the American people upon the fact that they did the service required of them at a greatly reduced cost. And likewise that there will be departmental chiefs who will do these same things. That hereafter Presidents will be elected, parties will be overthrown, upon the question of which party and which man in the great office of President can best serve the people for the least expense.

This bill proposes to take that question under serious consideration and afford a measure and method of its realization.

We propose an ante mortem examination of the patient—the public revenue. We propose that by a certain system of sound financial therapeutics we may restore the sick man and save his life, rather than wait until he is dead and hold a post mortem examination upon him and find out why he died. We propose in the beginning of things, before a dollar is collected or a dollar is expended, that there shall be squeezed out of the estimates and out of the appropriations and out of the proposed taxation the last dollar that is unnecessary to be taken from the people or spent in the public service.

The Select Committee on the Budget have reported a bill adapted to American conditions, but they have not been unmindful of historical conditions and historical precedents and the experience of other people. I shall therefore discuss three things in the English budget, because those three things are vital to the bill that we have reported.

The first is the preparation of estimates; the second, money in Parliament; and the third is the audit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the gentleman proceeds to take up the English system, may I ask him one question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He recalls that the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, advised that committee to reduce taxes automatically by 25 per cent on the ground that the revenues so derived would be amply sufficient to run the Government for the fiscal year 1919. The gentleman recalls the fact that a few days ago the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations showed that the expenses of the fiscal year 1919 would be something more than $10,500,000,000, so that we now find ourselves in the position of having automatically reduced taxes to a point where we will not raise more than $4,000,000,000 in the face of an expenditure of more than $10,000,000,000. Is it not to avoid just that sort of thing, that sort of wild guessing in the dark, that this bill has been drawn as a remedy?

Mr. HAWLEY. It will do that. It will provide a balanced statement of expenditures and revenues, and it will reduce the expenditures within the possibilities of the revenues, and reduce the revenues to the lowest possible amount consistent with the good of the public service.

There is one fundamental difference between our Government and the English Government. In the English Government the administration, or the executive, and the power that controls the legislation is one and the same body, namely, the cabinet, or ministry, or what is known in their phraseology as "the Government." The House of Commons, as such, never originates a policy. It only approves or rejects a policy proposed by the ministry. If it wishes to maintain a ministry in power, it accepts their policies. If it wishes to overthrow a ministry, it rejects their policies. But in this country Congress initiates policies on its own accord, and it approves all policies submitted by the Executive before they can be adopted. Consequently in our system we must take knowledge of the fact that we must not deprive the Congress of that power which it has long exercised, and which, in proportion to the expenditure, it has wisely exercised. In the last 25 years the Congress of the United States has appropriated $600,000,000 less than the Executive has recommended. In passing judgment upon the policies of the Executive we have found them at times too costly, or that the proposed work would cost more than the public good to be derived therefrom.

When Mr. Gladstone was prime minister he removed a minister from his cabinet because that man refused to cut down the expenditures of his department within the limits Mr. Gladstone thought that department could be carried on for. The minister said he could not afford to make the necessary and required reduction. Mr. Gladstone said, "They must be made." He dismissed from office that man and appointed another who would accomplish that purpose. We must make it possible to accomplish that result in this country or the conditions that confront us can not be successfully met in the coming years.

The fiscal year in Great Britain begins on April 1. So far as the system is concerned, the commons is supreme nominally. The cabinet is in control as long as it commands a majority of the House of Commons. In the cabinet the prime minister is the chief factor. Under him is the chancellor of the exchequer, for if a prime minister does not take, when he assumes the premiership, the chancellorship of the exchequer also, the next strongest man in the cabinet makes a bee line for that place.

The treasury in England has a double organization—a political and a financial organization. The political organization consists of a chancellor of the exchequer, who is frequently the prime minister, also known as the first lord of the treasury. Then they have four or five junior lords, who are part of the "scenery," but have nothing to do with the finances of the country, except that they are useful occasionally to sign documents; these junior lords act as parliamentary whips. There is a parliamentary secretary, who is the chief whip of the majority. There is a financial secretary, who is the assistant to the chancellor, both in the administration of the finances in the treasury and on the floor of the House of Commons. These men are all members of the cabinet, and you can see from that how great a voice the fiscal system and the treasury of Great Britain has in the cabinet of England and on the floor of the House of Commons by the number and the character of men who conduct its affairs.

There is then the permanent or financial organization, at the head of which is a permanent secretary. Sometimes the office is divided between the two men. They and the permanent staff under them do not change with the political changes in the Government.

The estimates are prepared in the treasury, and the process is as follows: In October of each year the permanent secretary of the treasury, acting for and on behalf of the chancellor of the exchequer, sends to every spending department a sheet containing, printed on it, every item of expenditure that that department or service was authorized to make in the last appropriation act. The amounts appropriated for that department or service for the last five years are set down in columns printed in for the convenience of the spending department in submitting its estimate, and also to let it know that the treasury is advised as to what the amounts should be. Then the department puts in the amount it estimates as needed for every item printed in the list as the estimate for the ensuing fiscal year.

Such estimates are arrived at in this way: The treasury is in constant touch with every spending department. Here is a department or "service" that wishes to add five men to its staff. They can not do that, even though they have the money appropriated for it, unless the treasury approves that addition of five men in what is known as a "treasury minute." Or it wishes to develop a service, and under the power of virement they have the authority to transfer sums from one service to another within a certain limitation. But they can not spend a dollar more than they did in the preceding year unless they submit that request to the treasury and the treasury minute approves of the change in the organization of that service. These are only illustrative cases; and the treasury has similar authority over many other activities.

That goes on every day in the year. The treasury department decides thousands and thousands of cases. They retain a copy of the minute. The spending service receives a copy of the minute, and if when it makes out its estimate in the estimate blank it wishes to add a clerk, or to change the service a little, or add a new service, it must put in a specially-prepared column the date and number of the treasury minute authorizing the changes; otherwise it is not authorized or warranted to include them in the estimate. So that every day of the year the treasury department is approving or disapproving the actions of the spending departments. The treasury department is, on the part of the executive, the cabinet of England, the power that enables it to hold down the spending department to the last shilling consistent with the proper performance of their public duties.

When the estimate circulars are received back by the treasury department it examines them. It notes every proposed item of expenditure and observes whether they are warranted by a comparison with the appropriations of the preceding year or reference to the treasury minutes. If there is any change at all the treasury then examines the quotation of the treasury minutes to see whether that change was authorized. If not, they require the spending department to show cause why that item should not go out of the estimate.

If there is a change in the organization of the service, the warrant for that must be cited in a treasury minute, and if they can not show warrant of authority for it the spending department is asked to show why that should not go out of the estimate. If a new service is added they make the same inquiry. They look for stowaways all through the estimates to see whether the spending department is attempting to get a new item included in a place where the treasury department will overlook it. Occasionally such an item is overlooked, but rarely. The result is that when the treasury department makes up the estimates, having collected all the estimate sheets, to be presented to the ministry for the ensuing fiscal year, the greater proportion of the items have been agreed on between the treasury and the spending departments. The remaining differences must then be settled. The treasury, in the case of a dispute between the spending departments and the treasury, appoints an interdepartmental committee if more than one department is concerned; otherwise, a departmental committee. The spending department offers its reasons for adding the new service or the new employee, or whatever it may be that they desire the enlargement for. The spending department may yield, the treasury may compromise, the treasury may yield, or there may be a deadlock. If there is a deadlock, the treasury refers it, on its side, to the chancellor of the exchequer, and the spending department refers it, on its side, to the head of the spending department, and the chancellor of the exchequer and the departmental head then endeavor to come to a conclusion. If they can reach no agreement, it then goes before the ministry. As against the treasury, the head of the spending department has the prevailing voice, in that it can bring it before the chancellor and the cabinet, but as against the head of the spending department the chancellor has the strongest voice in the cabinet, and the cabinet sustains the treasury in every possible case.

For that reason, then, the treasury department of England has grown to be a very powerful organization in the hands of the ministry for holding down the expenditures to the last possible pound consistent with the public good. It is not a department that goes around seeking trouble. Every spending department understands that the special obligation of the treasury is to reduce expenses, and they take it in good part. But it is an all-the-year-round work on their part, and the result is that they have effected some very remarkable economies in the public service.

I quote from Durell's Parliamentary Grants. This, I believe, is the latest book on the English fiscal system and the most authentic:

"The primary object of the treasury, as well as of the public accounts committee, is to complete and secure the control of Parliament over the public expenditure and to maintain financial order throughout the service. The treasury is the central financial authority of the State and all important changes in financial administration should either have its prior authority or at least be brought directly to its notice. 'By immemorial custom, the lords commissioners of the treasury have been constitutionally empowered to control all other departments of the State in matters of finance and public expenditure. In various facts of Parliament and reports of committees of the House of Commons this authority has been from time to time recognized and enforced.' The secretary of the board of audit emphasized the same point in 1865. Unless Parliament for some special purpose empowers some other department than the treasury to authorize expenditure, 'the source,' he said, 'of all administrative authority for expenditure is the treasury. The right of the treasury to determine what the several departments may spend and what they must not spend, though modified occasionally by certain special enactments, is incontestable and rests upon an unbroken prescription which has accordingly the force of law. The treasury, moreover, may exercise this right, provided that it does not transgress any parliamentary requirement in any way it pleases. * * * In short, the power of determining by what means the controlling authority of the Crown over the public expenditure can be best maintained belongs of right to the treasury, and the decision of the treasury as to what expenditure is or is not sufficiently authorized is final and without appeal.'

"This financial control is really the control of the chancellor of the exchequer, exercised through the subordinate or departmental treasury acting as his advisory staff." (D., 241.)

"The functions of the treasury in relation to public finance are to control, to authorize, and to advise apart from its duty of having to secure that the money required is available. It is strictly neither an expending nor a collecting department of the State, but rather the financing department for all other departments. It is responsible for seeing that the consolidated fund is always in a position to meet the demands made upon it, and therefore it is one of the first duties of the financial branch of the treasury to watch the rate at which issues are proceeding—to watch, that is to say, 'the overflow from the sluice,' namely, the issues from the exchequer. This it is able to do by being informed of the daily progress of imprests to the accounting departments, which enable them to carry on their daily expenditure from day to day, inasmuch as the issues are made on its direction. Nor again is it normally an executive department, though occasionally, and indeed frequently, there are many things to be done in the multifarious concerns of the country in regard to which the treasury is compelled to act as a department invested with the initiative, simply because there is no other department to do so. Still, this ought not to be done when there is another department which is able to take the initiative.

"The duty of preparing and consequently of criticizing the estimates on which the budget is to be based devolves upon the treasury, which is therefore necessarily possessed of very great power of control over public expenditure." (D., 242.)

"Economy is never attainable without efficiency—that is an absolute rule." (D., 243.)

"The business of the treasury, apart from policy and its rôle of representing how much money it is wise or not wise to spend, is to find out waste by all official legitimate means, to canvass unwise expenditure, and, by correlating the demands of the different departments, to secure the maintenance of the system of public accounting in them all on a principle of uniformity. It is, as regards the functions which it can exercise, a very effective instrument to produce financial order, for it is the nature of financial criticism to look for defects and propose remedies. It is the department on which Parliament mainly relies for the prevention of financial irregularities on the part of the accounting departments. Its control commences with the preparation of the estimates and continues throughout the various processes of expenditure, accounting, and audit until the final report of the public-accounts committee has been dealt with." (D., 244.)

"In the second place, the treasury is required to write minutes on the reports of the public-accounts committee and of the estimates committee. It is not required to adopt them, but it can not ignore them. Action is required to be taken and the treasury must present its minutes for the consideration of these committees in the next session. If it disagrees with the report, the reasons on which its objections are based must be stated. The committees therefore are not only certain of a hearing when dealing with the treasury but are certain also of ascertaining the attitude of the treasury, and, consequently, of being able to see whether their recommendations will or will not be carried out or whether it will be necessary to appeal to the final arbitrament of Parliament. It is inconceivable nowadays that the treasury should wish to ignore any portion of such reports. The spirit with which the modern treasury is imbued makes it zealous to assist in these improvements and proposals for efficiency, which are the objects aimed at in those reports. Disagreements on matters of principle or procedure are bound to arise, for there are two sides to every question; but the aim of the treasury is the aim of the committees—the settlement of a question in the manner most advantageous to the public service. In practice the treasury invariably takes each item of the reports which calls for notice, observation, or action and expresses a considered opinion on it. These minutes thus provide a valuable insight into the policy of the treasury in relation to principles and practice." (D., 246.)

"Among the chief merits of this central controlling authority are the following:

"1. It promotes financial order.

"2. It secures uniformity of system.

"3. It exercises a valuable influence in advising departments as to organization and similar general questions.

"4. It compels a department to justify its proposals.

"5. It acts as an impartial critic on the department's proceedings generally.

"Moreover, the existence of such a factor of control both relieves and strengthens the control of Parliament." (D., 251.)

"This general control by the treasury may, for convenience, be considered under three aspects, namely, control over the estimates, over the expenditure under votes, and over details, though the control so exercised under one of these heads frequently affects and is, in many points, inseparable from the others. Of these the first mentioned is anterior control, the second is concurrent control, and the third is both anterior and concurrent. With retrospective control, as secured by audit, the treasury is only indirectly concerned." (D., 252.)

"The general total, with which the departmental treasury is not officially concerned, being given, the departments draw up the estimates in detail and are required to obtain treasury sanction to them, separately and collectively, before they are presented to Parliament. It is only at this second stage that the subordinate or departmental treasury, as such, intervenes." (D., 253.)

"The control therefore of the subordinate or departmental treasury ends with financial criticism. If the chancellor of the exchequer chooses to call in question the policy of the departments, he does so as a member of the cabinet before the cabinet." (D., 255.)

"It is a constitutional rule that treasury sanction is necessary to any increase of expenditure, save only in the case of the establishments of the two Houses of Parliament. Not only is such sanction a necessity, but it is an obligation on the department, when presenting proposals involving fresh expenditures, to lay all the financial considerations before the treasury in full at the very outset." (D., 259.)

"Outside questions of a policy or technical points, there may be in some classes of expenditure a considerable margin between extravagant and economical administration." (D., 260.)

"The chancellor of the exchequer might make such a demand, and put pressure on a department to cut down its total estimate in order to bring it within the sum which he thinks he can afford." (D., 263.)

"It may be advisable at this stage to consider the form of the estimates in somewhat more full detail. The general form is governed by three main considerations:

"1. The supply of information to Parliament.

"2. The preservation of continuity of the votes.

"3. The maintenance of control.

"And it will be convenient to discuss them from these points of view." (D., 266.)

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the treasury department of England have the same arrangement that we have in this country——

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman must be a mind reader, because I was just going to take up that question.

Mr. DOWELL. I should like to hear what the gentleman has to say about that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, the question is, Why not make the Treasury Department in this country the budget-making organization and give it budgetary authority for making the estimates? The reason is very plain. If you have followed this brief analysis—and I must necessarily condense what I had intended to say because of the passage of time—you will observe that the treasury department in England is not a spending department, except to a very limited extent and for its own employees. It has practically nothing to do except this particular work that I have outlined, the preparation of the budget, informing itself by actual contact with the spending departments where reductions can be made, where excessive expenditures are in progress, where any service is overmanned, and in many other particulars, in order to reduce the expenditures to the lowest minimum.

In England the financial question for many years following Mr. Gladstone's ministry was the question that decided the survival or overturn of ministries. For that reason it has been essential to ministries in England that they make economical recommendations; but in order to do that they must have the information upon which to base such recommendations.

The English treasury is not a spending department. The Treasury of the United States is one of the largest spending departments in our Government. The English treasury does not collect revenue; our Treasury does. The English treasury does not administer the debt; our Treasury does. The English treasury does not coin money; our Treasury does. The English treasury does not issue paper money or securities; our Treasury does.

The English treasury does not keep a dollar of public funds in its possession. Our Treasury keeps all the public funds either actually or distributes them in depositories. The English treasury does not have these functions that our Treasury has—the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the Coast Guard Service, the Supervising Architect's Office, the Farm Loan Bureau, the Federal Reserve Board, the Public Health Service, and some other similar organizations.

The English treasury finds itself occupied every day of the year, from one year's end to the other, with preparation of the budget, the examination of proposed expenditures, and the duties outlined above. It does nothing else. If we made the Treasury of the United States the authority for the preparation of the budget in this country, we would have to strip it of all its present functions and give them to some other or new department, and make the Treasury a budget-making bureau, in order to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to give his whole time and attention to this work, since it would require all his time if he did the work effectively. To delegate it to a subordinate would be to court failure. We thought it not advisable to disrupt one great department of the Government in order to make it the budgetary authority. So we created in the office of the President of the United States a system fashioned somewhat like the English system of the treasury for preparing the estimates, under the President of the United States, which shall have the authority to do most of the things I have designated that the English treasury does. We have left to the President to direct its activities. If successful, it will be one of the hardest working of our public services.

We have practically made the President of the United States his own chancellor of the exchequer by giving him the authority to appoint men to make the budget in his office and to be responsible for that budget. We have not added to the powers of the President. We could not do that. He has, and will have, absolute authority over the estimates to be submitted. We have simply created this office, a bureau of the budget, fashioning it on the approved experience, which shall assist him in discharging his functions. We have given him authority to change the director and assistant director when he pleases if they do not do what he desires. We have given him a permanent official staff, which shall collect information, as the English treasury does, day after day, every hour, from every department of the Government.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman understands that we now have a statute, and have had for several years, in reference to the estimates——

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman means the statute of 1909?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. Does the gentleman intend to say something about that?

Mr. HAWLEY. Only what President Taft said, that he thought well of it, but that he did not have the machinery to prepare a budget. We are taking away that reason by giving the President of the United States the machinery for preparing a budget.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. About how large a personnel will this personal budget system have?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is something that experience will have to determine.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Was there any estimate in regard to it?

Mr. HAWLEY. We provide $100,000 for the office in its inception, and if it functions well it will save several millions.

Mr. FESS. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked him one or two questions?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will be glad to answer the gentleman, if I can.

Mr. FESS. Under this bill it will still remain as an executive rather than as a legislative budget. If this bill is carried into effect, it will be an executive budget?

Mr. HAWLEY. It will be an exeeutive budget.

Mr. FESS. You are not taking any power away from the President?

Mr. HAWLEY. We are not taking away any power from the President; we are simply giving him the necessary machinery for the exercise of the power he long ago ought to have exercised, and making it his duty to perform this important part of his public functions.

Mr. FESS. And with the authority you fix the responsibility upon him?

Mr. HAWLEY. He must say when he submits a budget that he has thoroughly investigated the public needs on both the revenue and expenditure sides, that he needs every dollar he asks for, does not need a dollar more and could not get along with a dollar less, and that the proposed revenues are necessary.

Mr. FESS. How independent do you make the auditing system?

Mr. HAWLEY. Absolutely independent from the spending departments. We give it a judicial status. It examines questions as a court examines questions, upon the law and upon evidence.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the gentleman another question which was discussed some time ago. The power of appointment would carry with it the power of removal unless there was a limitation written into the law.

Mr. HAWLEY. Of which office is the gentleman speaking?

Mr. FESS. I am speaking of the comptroller and the assistant comptroller who are appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate. The power to appoint has always been interpreted to carry with it the power of removal, unless in the appointment there was some inhibition written in the law.

Mr. HAWLEY. We thought that these men, having a judicial status, ought to have a judicial tenure of office. We have thought that they ought to be secure in the tenure of office unless they were incompetent, guilty of malfeasance of office, or dereliction of duty, or have otherwise shown themselves unfit to hold their places. Then they can be removed if in the judgment of the two Houses of Congress they ought to be removed.

Mr. WELLING. But he can not be removed by the President.

Mr. HAWLEY. No.

Mr. FESS. He could be removed by impeachment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; but we provide a more expeditious method.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman mean that impeachment proceedings would not lie?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; I do not mean that; but we provide another way, more summary.

Mr. FESS. By concurrent resolution?

Mr. HAWLEY. By concurrent resolution of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. FESS. In other words, the man who is appointed may be independent of the appointing power, and at the same time if the legislative branch finds that he is not desirable, although he may be desirable to the appointing power, the legislative branch can remove him?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; he is our officer, in a measure, getting information for us, to enable us to reduce expenditures and to keep advised of what the spending departments are doing. If he does not do his work properly, we, as practically his employers, ought to be able to discharge him from his office.

Mr. FESS. The auditing, then, is entirely independent of the spending departments.

Mr. HAWLEY. From every spending department.

Mr. FESS. That is a great improvement.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, when a budget is made in England, as the gentleman has described, although I think he did not refer to it further, if it does not go through, then the Government is turned out and they go to the people. We can not do that. A Senator's tenure of office is six years, ours two years, and the President's four.

Mr. HAWLEY. But I think the distinguished gentleman will agree that that is no reason for not having a well-prepared budget?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. I am in entire harmony with the removal of this comptroller general by concurrent resolution and making him independent of the Executive, although the Executive appoints him originally. Under the bill he has a fixed tenure, unless the House and the Senate turns out by concurrent resolution that there ought to be some one else there.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one other interruption?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Referring to the matter that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] mentioned, in England the budget has been a great issue, more than any other one issue in the last 50 years.

Mr. HAWLEY. Since the time of Gladstone.

Mr. FESS. As the gentleman will recall, Gladstone came to the front of his tremendous fight against Mr. Disraeli on the budget system. What I was getting at is this: While the responsible ministry system in vogue in Britain and France could not be utilized here, if this plan will fix the responsibility upon the Executive we will have the issue so that while there is no possibility of dissolution and going back to the people it will become a distinctive issue before the country at our periodic elections.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is true. To pass on to the second division, I wish now to discuss money in Parliament. When the budget is submitted to the House of Commons, through the treasury, all the civil estimates are moved by the chancellor of the exchequer. The army and navy estimates are moved by the respective ministers of the army and the navy. The army and navy estimates are on a little different basis from the civil estimates, but I shall not have time now to make the distinction. There is no committee in the House of Commons corresponding to our Committee on Appropriations. They have tried several times to appoint what they call an estimates committee to revise and examine the estimates, but should the estimates committee make any serious changes in the ministry's proposal they create a Government crisis, and the estimates committee therefore has not functioned very well. In the last report of the select committee on reform in the House of Commons—for by the act of 1911 the House of Lords can not refuse its assent to any money bill—they call attention to the fact that the House of Commons is practically a rubber stamp so far as the voting of money is concerned; that they have no authority over any inception of appropriations, in the reduction or character of the appropriations. They are proposing some method for relieving that situation, to give the House of Commons more authority over appropriations to reduce them, especially below the budgetary estimates of the ministry, without causing a crisis in the Government.

I quote the following from Young's The System of National Finance:

"It is for the House of Commons alone to grant money and to limit the uses of its grant; it is for the House of Lords to assent to the grant, with the limited power of criticism left to it by the Parliament act. The whole initiative is with the Commons, but in the exercise of that right the House of Commons has imposed upon itself a very important limitation. By a self-denying ordinance it has deprived the generality of its own members of the power of initiative in imposing charges on the people, and has limited that power to the Crown. By the Crown, since ours is a constitutional and limited monarchy, we understand the King's executive ministers who sit in Parliament and are responsible to it. So the limitation of initiative by the House to the Crown is in fact a limitation to those of its own members who are responsible for the executive government. No grant can be proposed unless a minister demands it. No proposal can be made that a tax be imposed or increased unless a minister signified the assent of the Crown to the proceeding, and thus certifies that the money is needed for the public service. No member not a responsible minister can get up and propose the imposition of a public charge on his own initiative. The matter is regulated by a standing order of the House of Commons. It is No. 66 which provides that 'this House will receive no petition for any sum relating to the public service or proceed upon any motion for a grant or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the consolidated fund or out of money to be provided by Parliament, unless recommended by the Crown.'"

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And for the reasons that the gentleman has just stated, he has discovered, of course, as have the rest of us who have read the parliamentary debates, that the estimates are not discussed in the House of Commons as they are here.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am coming to that. The estimates are submitted in the form of votes. There are 150 votes in the Book of Estimates. The whole budget is submitted at once. When the estimates are submitted to Parliament, the chancellor makes what is known as the budget speech, in which he discusses the policies of the dominant party, and especially as they are implied in the estimates. Then the opposition asks to be heard on certain parts of the budget which they propose to make the issues in the next election. These are submitted to the House of Commons, and the house, after a certain number of days, determines by vote the order in which they shall be considered. Members of the dominant party may submit questions, but the opposition is usually given the privilege of presenting its issues. That is on the old theory that before a grant of money can be made in England a redress of grievance must be had. Twenty days are given from the time of meeting in February to adjournment on August 5 for the consideration of the budget. There are no appropriation committees that ever investigate a single item before they vote. There is no consideration by a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, such as we have under the five-minute rule. When the first of the 20 days has arrived, and the days for discussion are set at various periods between February and August 5, they set up what they call "supply," or, as we would say, go into the Committee of the Whole, the motion being "that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair." A chairman of the committee on supply is appointed. Then the opposition makes its attack on certain policies of the ministry, and the ministry reply. This discussion continues during the days set until, as frequently occurs, practically the whole time is consumed without any investigation of special value of the items proposed by the spending departments.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And they never go into detail.

Mr. HAWLEY. Never going into detail. The members of the House of Commons have no idea of what the details are so far as the parliamentary proceedings are concerned. They can get them from the reports if they will dig them out. After 18 days of debate have thus been had the nineteenth day comes as the day of judgment. The chairman calls the votes in order. If, for instance, there have been passed 10 votes in the preceding 18 days, then on the nineteenth day he calls the eleventh vote, the twelfth vote, the thirteenth vote, the fourteenth vote, and these are passed in order down to the one hundred and fiftieth vote—passed under what they call the guillotine and without any debate.

It is impossible under their rules for any objection to be offered to any expenditure while the guillotine is falling on the votes. On the twentieth—these 20 days may be extended to 23 at the application of the opposition with the consent of the ministry—on the twentieth day the House of Commons then reports, like we do from our Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, back to the house the action of the committee on supply, that it has voted the budget. On that day they agree to the report of the committee on supply, as we agree in this House on a report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Now, these votes are only authorizations. They are not appropriations under which the spending department are authorized, when the votes are passed, to begin spending the money so voted, but must await the passage of the annual appropriation act, which is always passed a few days before adjournment on August 5. Then they set up the ways and means committee and vote the taxes necessary to meet the appropriations.

Mr. FESS. Will it interrupt the gentleman for me to ask him one more question?

Mr. HAWLEY. When I finish this statement. They set up a ways and means committee in the same way they set up the committee on supply to vote the taxes, and when that is pending no motion is in order to change the proposals of the ministry.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman has answered my question, but he made some statement that the members of the House of Commons did not know the details. There is a reason for that, because they are not permitted to make any motion to change any of them.

Mr. HAWLEY. The only motion permitted is to reduce an item, and that has not been appealed to for many years.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman answered my question before I asked it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then one other item——

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Suppose the opposition in the British Parliament should succeed in their attack upon any item?

Mr. HAWLEY. Any vote?

Mr. WELLING. Any item of the budget, and should obtain an adverse vote. Would Parliament at once go to the country?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are three options open to the ministry. They may consider that the house had not expressed a want of confidence in them, and that is one of the special recommendations of the ninth report of the select committee of 1918, that in order to give a great opportunity to the House of Commons to reduce the expenditures the ministry need not make a particular vote the subject of political consideration. They can consider that the house has not lost confidence in them and risk another vote. That very seldom occurs. They may resign from office and let a new ministry assume office or they may ask the Crown, which is the ministry, to dissolve Parliament, thereby terminating the service of every member of the house, and go to the country to elect an entirely new body, to determine whether the new body so elected will support the ministry or the opposition.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for one other question, and this is the last one?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. This is the last, and I shall not further interrupt the gentleman. I put the question to him because he is very familiar with the history of this procedure. Did the committee consider at all the advisability of preventing a motion from the floor of the House to change items in the bill that is to be reported by the thirty-five?

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman means from our Budget Committee?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Budget Committee considered that and the fact that the Congress approves all policies proposed by the Executive before they become effective and originates entirely the greater proportion of the policies of our country, and thought it advisable not to handicap the membership of the House by providing that Members should not be given an opportunity freely to offer amendments on the floor of the House.

Mr. FESS. And those amendments could not be thrown out on a point of order?

Mr. HAWLEY. Only under the rules as now constituted. Now as to the question of audit. The treasury of the English Government, having held the estimates to the lowest possible shilling consistent with the public good and the budget having been passed by the House of Commons, the spending departments are now in a position to ask that funds be made available for their work. The public funds are generally held in the consolidated fund in the Bank of England. Before they can get a shilling the treasury applies to the comptroller and auditor general for permission to have issued to the treasury——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does the gentleman desire more time? If so, I am authorized by the chairman [Mr. Good] to extend the time of the gentleman. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HAWLEY. Could I have as many as 15 minutes?

Mr. TEMPLE. I yield that time to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 15 additional minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. To repeat that statement because of the interruption. Before the treasury can make available to the spending department a pound it must apply to the comptroller and auditor general for permission to have a credit at the Bank of England. That letter sets forth in some detail the services for which the money is desired, the amount for each service, and the period of time during which it is to be used. The comptroller and auditor general having examined the law and the appropriations and finding that these services have this money appropriated for their use, that the proportion asked for is not in excess of what they should use for the time specified in the request, issues the necessary authorization. The treasury then has a credit at the Bank of England available for the proposed expenditures. It, in turn, receives applications from the paymasters or spending officers of the services for a credits on their behalf. The treasury likewise makes what further examination may be necessary and advises the Bank of England that the spending departments are to be credited with specified amounts of money to be spent within a certain time, but not a pound more can be spent within that time without special treasury sanction, and this special treasury sanction must be supported by a new permit from the comptroller and auditor general for additional credit.

Now, the spending departments having their credit begin their expenditures, and the minute they begin an expenditure the comptroller and auditor general, on his side, representing the House of Commons, as their special officer, has the authority and power to have sent to him every document, every voucher, every contract made by any department, or the papers relating to any expenditure authorized by any department, to see whether they comply with the law and are within the appropriation and the limit of credit established. He can disallow items when he decides the expenditure to be unauthorized, and he reports all irregularities to the public accounts committee of the House of Commons for their consideration. The comptroller and auditor general follows the course of business in every department day after day.

His staff examines the accounts and operations of every department, as the Treasury does. The Treasury and the comptroller and auditor general have cooperative working arrangements, for both have the same purposes in view. When they have any spending service on the carpet, the Treasury sits with the comptroller and auditor general and the public accounts committee. The Treasury Department, in preparing the estimates, holds an ante mortem examination to save the life of the patient if they can. The comptroller and auditor general conduct a post-mortem examination to see why the patient died and how to save the next. The comptroller and auditor general have the same status in England as we propose to give our comptroller and auditor general, a judicial status and a life tenure.

It will be noted that the office of comptroller general proposed to be created by the bill does not give as wide powers or impose as many duties upon the comptroller general as are given to and exercised by the comptroller and auditor general in England. Experience will show, however, in what particulars we should amplify the powers of the comptroller general.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. In order to make him correspond more nearly to the corresponding British officer, would he not be removable by the two Houses of Congress? That is, easily removable. He is under this bill, as I understand, removable, but for such cases as are enumerated. It may be somewhat difficult to do.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman may have failed to note a very significant phrase, "when in their judgment."

Mr. TILSON. If it were done it would have to be for one of the causes enumerated?

Mr. HAWLEY. He is summarily removed, and that is the end of it.

Mr. TILSON. On that line he should be easily removable by the responsible party in power in Congress.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; it is so provided. The Treasury prepares all the forms of accounting.

It prepares and sends out, as I have already noted, the estimates circular, so that the estimates come in in a uniform character. They do not allow changes in the form of estimates, except upon urgent necessity, so that year after year, if anyone desires to make comparisons, he can easily tabulate the expenditures for any particular service and see whether that service is growing or diminishing in cost. The treasury sends out all forms of accounting and costing, to keep understandable public records, so that when one official goes from one department to another making inquiries as to any accounting or any costing matter he is as familiar with the system in that department as he is with his own. They have the same kind of costing and accounting and other arrangements in one department that they have in another. That is one thing we hope our comptroller and auditor general and our budget committee will require to be done. It will greatly simplify the keeping of the public accounts and thus increase the value of any financial information that we receive.

In conclusion, unless there is some further question——

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question if it will not interfere.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Did the Budget Committee consider recommending a change in the Constitution so as to permit the President vetoing separate items in appropriation bills?

Mr. HAWLEY. We did not. I do not think that was in the purview of the resolution creating this committee. It specified two things—the proposed legislation on the budget system and proposed amendments to the rules.

Mr. HASTINGS. In my judgment, that would enable us to cut out a good many items of doubtful propriety in appropriation bills.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think it would result in that in many instances. I understand the State of Illinois in its budget system has given, by an amendment to its constitution, that power to the governor.

Mr. PLATT. Under the system proposed——

Mr. HAWLEY. And Ohio, too, I am informed.

Mr. HASTINGS. And Oklahoma, also, has.

Mr. HAWLEY. We are getting some valuable testimony.

Mr. PLATT. It has been so in New York for a long time. Under the system proposed the President would have to approve the estimates in advance.

Mr. HAWLEY. He will necessarily approve the budget before he submits it to Congress, but like any sensible man, with a balance wheel in his head, he should change his mind if the facts justify.

Mr. TILSON. After all, Congress has the right to increase his estimates even then.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to speak on the responsibility of Congress under this system. When the budget is received by Congress it has been approved by the President. He has said to us he needs that amount of money, not a dollar more, and can not get along with a dollar less. When it comes before Congress we have two responsibilities. If we accept his budget without change, we share the responsibility with the President. If we change that budget by reducing items or by increasing items, by eliminating items or adding items, we have assumed a responsibility of our own in addition to that responsibility we have in the matter of the items that the President submitted and which we adopted without change. We have not changed the responsibility of the House in this bill; we have not changed the opportunity of the House to examine the estimates. The committees can go just as thoroughly into them as they ever have gone, and they can go more thoroughly into them. With the independent auditing system, we can get immediate information. Every committee will have in the auditor's department a staff that can be put, in case of need, to gathering information quickly. We will not have to introduce a resolution in the House, have it considered, send it down to a department, and, after waiting a time, politely inquire whether or not they received our letter; and then, when we do get the information, have it practically of no value. We will have an expert accounting department that will quickly submit authentic information. That will increase the power of Congress over appropriations, but at the same time it will increase our responsibility in the matter of making appropriations.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. My only fear is, if the Congress still retains the right, which I think it will have, to either increase or reduce, will not that, in a way, shift the responsibility from the President so that, while he has the estimates now, he does not feel any responsibility, because Congress does it in the finality?

Mr. HAWLEY. In answer to the gentleman's question, I will state my opinion. I do not wish to attempt in any way to bind the committee. While I respect the great office of President, and hope that it will always be conferred on men competent for its great duties, yet I have known in our history men to go from this body to that great office and fill it with high renown. I would not tie the hands of the Members of the House or impair their opportunities or diminish their chances of rendering public service to the country in the initiation of great public policies. If a man sitting in the President's chair can inaugurate great policies leading to the expenditure of money, that same man, as a Representative, or men of equal ability, standing on the floor of Congress are just as competent to inaugurate policies for the public good. [Applause.] I believe in making the House of Representatives, which is the truly representative body in this country, because of our direct elections and short terms, just as strong as possible. This is the place where the people of the United States can secure the quickest response if they object to anything that is being done in the public service.

Among the men who have been Presidents of the United States, John Quincy Adams, William Henry Harrison, John Tyler, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, and Andrew Johnson served both in the House and Senate; James K. Polk, Millard Fillmore, Abraham Lincoln, Rutherford B. Hayes, James Garfield, and William McKinley served in the House only; and James Monroe, Martin Van Buren, and Benjamin Harrison served in the Senate only; that is, 15 out of the 26 Presidents of the United States have served in one or both Houses of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. In the discussion of the procedure in England was it considered in the committee as to the other parts of the procedure where the department bureaus are called into the House of Commons to answer questions from Members? Was that considered in any way in connection with the procedure here?

Mr. HAWLEY. When we had the witnesses before us that was discussed to some extent. It was in the minds, I am confident, of all the members. When the chancellor of the exchequer moves any vote, the heads of the particular services which have the expenditure of the money under the vote are at his side to afford him information necessary to answer questions that may be asked.

Mr. McKEOWN. Was that considered as to whether any of that procedure would be carried out here under this system?

Mr. HAWLEY. You mean to have the President's Cabinet with his subordinates appear here from time to time when we were discussing the appropriation bills and defend the items we discuss on the floor?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes. In that particular I understand that in the English system members of the house can file with the clerk of the house questions in writing, to be propounded to the heads of these departments with reference to expenditures, and they are required to answer them.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. They are given two days' notice and required to answer them.

Mr. McKEOWN. Was anything of that kind discussed in the committee as applicable to the procedure here under this system?

Mr. HAWLEY. We had that under consideration in a general way, but when we ascertained that it was not advisable to have the Secretaries of the Cabinet come on the floor of the House and defend their estimates, that particular proposition of course went with the others.

In the treasury estimate circulars sent out in October there are two things that are like what the Hon. JAMES R. MANN once said of the last lines of Thanatopsis, that the Government Printing Office kept them set up in stereotyped form for use in eulogies.

There are two stereotyped statements in that circular. One is that the state of the revenue demands the utmost economy; and if there is anything a spending department in England hears, morning, noon, and night, it is that statement, because when the duty devolves upon the treasury to decide some particular issue, they cite that statement about the state of revenue demanding economy, and I suspect the heads of departments over there could sing it in chorus. But it is excellent advice. It has resulted in the reduction of a vast amount in the estimates and in the saving to the people of great sums of money. The other is that the preceding year's appropriation must not be taken as the starting point for this year's estimates. I once served on an appropriation committee. I think there is one vice prevalent we should correct if we can, and that is the practice of assuming last year's estimates or appropriations as a starting point. The British treasury, even if there is no change in the appropriations, compels the spending departments when it writes the estimate opposite the item (the same amount it may be as in preceding years) to show good cause why it should be continued at all, or why it should not be reduced. They will not allow them to begin on the last year's appropriation and build up on that, and so permit the pyramiding of appropriations. The British treasury assumes that the spending department is not entitled to a dollar for any service unless it can make a good showing, and it seems to me it is a good, sound financial policy to inaugurate here, so far as it may be necessary.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. From his investigations of the British financial plan, can the gentleman say whether or not it is the policy of the British Government to carry on its Government with very many less employees in its various departments than ours, as compared with our Government in the same kind of work?

Mr. HAWLEY. I looked for the information and obtained it only inferentially, but I am of opinion that the personnel cost in Great Britain is less than the personnel cost in this country. I have no comparative statement, but that is my opinion. They annually appropriate $1,000,000,000, about the same amount we appropriate in normal times. It costs them less for each dollar of service than it costs us by reason of the treasury control over the addition of personnel.

Now, suppose we authorize in an act the addition of certain men to a department or to a special bureau. The appointing officers here have the absolute right to appoint them without any official from any accounting department making an examination to determine whether they really need them, or whether after they have had them three months they should be continued or whether after they have had them six months they should be continued. Since the estimates are made many months prior to the taking effect of the appropriation conditions may have so changed that a smaller additional number could do the work required. But when the British Parliament under the estimates makes an appropriation, we will say, for the addition of 10 persons to any particular service, before they can employ them—they are appointed by the treasury—before the treasury will employ all or any of them, that department must convince the treasury that there is need for some or all of them. The expenditure of appropriations is not considered mandatory. The treasury then raises the question, "Do you need 1 man or 10 men for the year or for six months, or for three months, or for nine months?" They can raise this question at any time, and just as soon as the spending department can not justify to the treasury department the employment of the 1 or the 10 they are dismissed. The treasury department has authority to terminate their service.

Mr. PLATT. In the House of Commons, when a new policy is determined upon which is going to call for a considerable expenditure, such, for instance, as old-age pensions, that goes in as a part of the budget, does it not?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The change of policy is incorporated in the budget. Of course we can not do that. We have made no provision for such a thing as that. Our budget simply takes care of routine expenditures.

Mr. HAWLEY. The English budget provides for the authorized expenditures. The legislation usually precedes the budgetary estimate; after the legislation is enacted, the estimate is brought in.

Mr. PLATT. Do not the two go together when there is a new policy established?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are bad exceptions to all good rules, but I have stated what I understand to be the principle.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman speaks frequently of the English treasury, but does not the treasury in the English Government occupy much the same position that the bureau of the budget would occupy under this proposed new system here? remarks, and pointed out the distinction between the English

Mr. HAWLEY. I made that clear at the beginning of my treasury and ours, and said that the English treasury was, in its operations, similar to the bureau of the budget which we propose, and not at all like our Treasury, except that it spells its name in the same way.

Mr. TILSON. Unfortunately, I was called out of the Hall for a few minutes during the earlier portion of the gentleman's very interesting and instructive remarks. As I understand, it is expected that the director of the budget will perform something like the service that the English treasury performs?

Hr. HAWLEY. The permanent secretary for the treasury of England.

Mr. PLATT. The question which I am now about to ask is not entirely germane. Does not the gentleman think we could save something if we abolished the Independent Treasury entirely and had the money of the Government deposited in the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. HAWLEY. Please do not lead me into the discussion of an entirely extraneous issue.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The rule forbids it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it contemplated to bring all our appropriation measures in as one bill, to provide for the military, the Naval Establishment, the Post Office, the Department of Agriculture, and all these other services in one bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have purposely avoided discussing the proposed amendment to the rules because it confuses the discussion I am endeavoring to present. If the Congress enacts this bill into law, and changes the rules providing for one Committee on Appropriations, then when that committee submits its report it will be a balanced statement of revenues on the one side, with expenditures for the whole system of government on the other, so that we will have before us at one view all that it is proposed to do in the matter of revenue and expenditure during that session of Congress—of course, outside of supplemental estimates.

Mr. FESS. And when we adopt the report of that one appropriating committee the appropriations will have been made, except the deficiencies that may come up later.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; and we intend to discourage deficiencies, so that a department or bureau that wants a deficiency appropriation will think it is fishing in a shallow pool. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. If the Government should undertake a new function or create a new department, that department would be authorized by legislation, without any estimate of its cost necessarily, so that we would not have the opportunity to discuss at one time the feasibility of the new department and the cost accompanying it under this new rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon five minutes more.

Mr. HAWLEY. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Indiana, I think this will be the procedure: The legislative committees will continue to report legislation. I presume the gentleman is speaking in anticipation of the possible adoption of the rule consolidating the appropriating committees. The legislative committees will continue to report legislation. They would not be without authority to make an authorization of appropriations if in their judgment the authorization of appropriations was necessary to explain the legislation. Very frequently when a proposition of legislation is propounded some Member on the floor of the House will inquire, "How much will it cost?" And an estimate of the cost is sometimes a very material factor for the information of the House in the consideration of legislation. Any legislative committee would be authorized to report legislation with an estimate of cost, but not to appropriate a single dollar. The appropriation would go entirely to the new committee if that rule were adopted.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Then, in case the Congress should create a new function of the Government and authorize an appropriation, it would be within the power of the Budget Committee to ignore it absolutely, and it never could get before the House?

Mr. HAWLEY. In answer to that question I will say that when the Congress has by solemn act of legislation adopted a policy which requires the expenditure of money, I doubt if any appropriations committee will have the temerity to refuse the appropriation, unless the Public Treasury could not stand the burden and some things must stand aside, and that was among the things that could best stand aside. We will endeavor, if I understand it, in the future, under the new conditions of burdensome taxation and the greatly increased cost of government over normal revenue, to live within our means, as Mr. Micawber said.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I am heartily in favor of the bill, but I can see where this Budget Committee, which the gentleman has not been discussing, would be the determining factor as to whether the Government should engage in a new function or not. That may be very wise. I am not saying it is unwise, but we should have that clearly in view.

Mr. HAWLEY. The question of the rule will come up at another time.

Mr. WELLING. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Suppose the enlarged Committee on Appropriations were to bring in this balance statement of expenditures and receipts of the Government which the gentleman suggests, and then a proposition should come up in Congress for the establishment of a national park in some part of the country. I mention that merely as an illustration. Would that sort of a bill, introduced by a Member of the House, be met with the solid front of objection of this appropriating committee that all of the money that the Government would have at its disposal for that particular year had been disbursed, and that we could not introduce any new legislation of that sort?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; I do not see where the Appropriation Committee under the proposed rule would have any authority to say what bills should be introduced or what bills any committee could consider and report.

Mr. WELLING. There would be no sense of introducing a bill unless it could be considered or acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Under the rules of the House a proposition for a national park or anything else, if a point of order is made, could not go on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; but I understood the gentleman to indicate the introduction of a bill in the ordinary method and have it considered by the proper committee. It could be done then as now. After the park was created and maintenance authorized, it would be for the Appropriations Committee to make the appropriation.

Mr. WELLING. The thought I wanted to get at is this: The Appropriations Committee, for instance, disburse all the revenues of the Government for any particular year in their budget plan. How can any other legislation that may be introduced upon the floor of the House for the public interest receive a proper hearing since all the money has been disbursed?

Mr. HAWLEY. That would only take place provided the act for the park was passed after the introduction of the budget. In that event it would have to go into the next year's budget.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, if legislation was enacted after the budget had been made up, that legislation could pass if the majority was with it.

Mr. HAWLEY. And the point of order was not made.

Mr. CANNON. The point of order would not be good if the legislation was on the statute books.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is right.

The House of Commons has created a committee known as the Public Accounts Committee. The members of this committee are selected because of their experience in financial matters and willingness to devote time and attention to an examination of the expenditures of the public money. The Comptroller and Auditor General makes notes of the action of the spending departments with which he disagrees. At the end of the year he files a full report with the Public Accounts Committee. The Public Accounts Committee, with the assistance of the Comptroller and Auditor General, examines the officials in the spending departments responsible for the matters in disagreements and reports to the House of Commons for its action. This is a post-mortem examination and the Select Committee on National Expenditure for 1918 recommends that the standing orders be so amended as to require the Comptroller and Auditor General to report his findings currently that action may be taken by the Public Accounts Committee immediately upon matters reported by him. This suggestion seems to me to command great merit. The chairman of the Public Accounts Committee is practically always a member of the opposition. We have not reported in this bill a provision for the creation of such a committee nor has it been included in the proposed amendment to the rules. The matter has been left for future action. There is a question whether there should be a joint Committee on Public Accounts or whether the House and Senate should each have such a committee. The Public Accounts Committee has been the means of affording the House of Commons a degree of control and a certainty of information that they could not have secured without it. I believe that the principle involved is one of the greatest important and that in due time we shall avail ourselves of this method of increasing the power of Congress over public expenditures in the interest of efficiency and economy.

Now, in conclusion I desire to recur to a statement I made in the beginning. I believe that under our present conditions, with our tremendous indebtedness, with a diminishing revenue, in that the earnings of the people in the future from which we have derived income taxes will be reduced, because they will not receive such large incomes as they have in the past, with our sources of income restricted, it is necessary to exercise the utmost economy, and that there will come in each succeeding campaign, as Mr. Gladstone established his prestige with England, among the aspirants for the office of President men competent in financial affairs who will administer the affairs of the Government with less cost to the country than heretofore and with better service. These two needs, in my judgment, will be among the main issues in the future campaigns.

We have too cumbersome a governmental machine. It takes too much fuel to get up power to make it go. We have to put too much fuel in the shape of dollars into the furnace to make the machine operate. It takes too many people to shovel the money into it. We need a reduction in the cost of service and a reduction in the number of persons employed. Because in the last analysis we are not operating this Government for the benefit of any class of citizens, not even for the salary-drawing class, but we are operating it for the good of the people, 100,000,000 strong, that we may render them the best service possible for the least amount of money. [Applause.]

I believe the bill now pending in this committee over which the gentleman from Iowa has presided with great fairness and discretion, giving every opportunity for the witnesses and the members of the committee to be heard and ask questions—I believe this bill is essentially a step in the right direction to establish a more firmly democratic government in this country, controlled by the people and administered in their behalf and interest. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a quorum of the committee here.

Mr. GOOD. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not make it necessary to have a call of the House.

Mr. WALSH. I have listened to these very interesting speeches on this subject, and most of them by members of the committee, and it seems to me that unless we have a quorum we are not going to hear those who are opposed to the bill.

Mr. GOOD. We have on the program some who are opposed to the measure, and they will be ushered in very shortly.

Mr. WALSH. Very well, I will withhold it for a while and see what we are going to get.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this bill creating a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts. I feel that the system under which we are now operating is both antiquated and extravagant. The gentleman who has just preceded me has well said it is too hard to get up steam, it takes too much coal in the shape of money, too much fuel, and too many people to shovel it in.

This bill provides for a director of the budget and for an assistant to be appointed by the President, and these directors, with the other officials appointed in the bill, constitute the bureau of the budget in the office of the President, which is to prepare data and assist the President in the preparation of a budget, who will transmit the same to Congress after having made such alterations, deductions, and so forth, as he may deem proper.

It repeals the law which provides that the various departments should transmit their estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he without any supervision or authority whatever over these has been transmitting them to Congress.

The people through this budget will know exactly what the entire cost of the Government is to be for the next fiscal year, just as soon as it is transmitted by the President, and will have ample time to study and approve or disapprove the various items.

They can then submit to their various representatives, if they desire, their objection to any portion of the budget, so that their representatives will know the desires of their constituents; in other words, it will let the light in on the budget as an entirety before it is too late to take action and will give the public abundant time for mature consideration.

I believe if we can concentrate public attention on the national budget when it is so framed, not as the estimate of one department but the estimates of all the departments, if we can throw the calcium light of public attention on the budget when sent down by the President, it will not only reduce the expenses of this Government but it will reduce the responsibility of Congress, and it will largely reduce the criticisms of Congress which it has not merited.

We all know that the committees of Congress have always taken the estimates submitted by the different departments, pared them down in committee, and when they have been brought into the House the membership, by constant attention, criticism, and discussion of each and every item, have reduced them as much as possible consistent with the departmental demands.

The public generally do not go back of the congressional appropriations and ascertain the demands made upon Congress for the multitude of governmental expenditures, and so Congress receives all the criticism for expenses of the Government.

The people do not realize that Congress is but putting its stamp of approval upon the departmental demands after they have used the acid test of elimination applied to each and every item of the estimate separately.

The public should more closely scrutinize the departmental items, see to the elimination of all waste, whether it be by excess expenditures for material or for an overabundant list of employees; the latter seems at this time to be the principal waste and extravagance of our various departments. I do not criticize the departments too strongly, nor do I blame employees. I realize that during the war vast numbers of employees were taken on, and that it is difficult to decrease and unusually hard upon the employee who is dropped from the Government pay roll. The American people will, however, sooner or later demand reduction. It will become the great issue before the American people sooner or later—and the "later" is not far distant. Excess costs and excess employees must go, not perhaps at the sole demand of Congress, but the demand of a heavily taxed people, who will rise up and demand retrenchment in every department and every branch of Government.

The budget, as I have said, thus emanating from the hands of the President, will enable the people to judge more accurately, and with facts and figures before them express their wishes and desires more clearly.

The people do not realize that the departments demand the money; they do not realize that Congress can not take the responsibility at all times of denying them the money; so the criticism goes on of Congress because of these vast appropriations.

When we consider the changes which have taken place in the revenues and expenditures of the Government we must naturally understand that a system which perhaps cared for the country moderately well in the early days could not take care of present conditions. It could not be expanded correctly for such vast bookkeeping and accounting.

There was a time when the larger portion of our revenues was derived from the tariff and from the internal-revenue tax on liquors and tobacco. During 52 years prior to 1917 there had been only something over $600,000,000 collected from direct taxes, and that from but few people. In the year 1909, 52,498 corporations in the United States made tax returns showing taxable income, while in 1917, 232,000 made returns. During the calendar year of 1913, 357,598 persons made individual income-tax returns, and for the year 1917 this was increased to 3,472,890.

Can you imagine any private corporation with its book accounts so vastly increased adhering to an old system which had long since become obsolete?

In 1914 we expended something over $1,025,000,000, while for 1919 it is estimated that it will take to settle our obligations for the war and run the Government something around eleven billions. This, of course, including obligations created during the war period for which we must now pay.

This important legislation we have long delayed. We sought to have had a budget system certainly before the war began. When we realize what taxes have been collected, when we realize the expenditures that have been made, we can readily see how inadequate our system is under modern conditions, with the vast revenues and expenditures now necessary. So long as the people paid their taxes indirectly through a tariff and an internal revenue on certain articles of luxury they did not much concern themselves, but now, when taxation is heavy and the taxgatherer delves into a man's business affairs, when taxation burdens his livelihood, when he is asked all manner of questions as to his business, his profits, and his expenditures, when it affects the very livelihood of his family and education of his children, we can readily understand why the people become more interested in national legislation, in appropriations, and in revenues. The people of this country do not object to the payment of taxes, but they want a dollar in service or in material for every dollar of taxes they pay, and I believe by this system we will be able to materially help them in that respect.

As I say, it will throw the light of public attention upon the budget when it is sent to Congress. The people of the country will realize that the President, an elective officer of the Nation, and directly accountable to them, has submitted the budget. They have the right to look to him for protection and care. They will know then where to place the responsibility; and if Congress chooses to increase the budget, it will take that responsibility. If it chooses to decrease it without injury to the Government, Congress will get the credit for it. I believe the people will largely appreciate these things. What we want to do at this time it to save every dollar in expenditure that we can possibly save and thereby lessen the burden of taxes under which the people are groaning at this time. If we pass this bill we will certainly go a long way toward satisfying the demands of the people. In my State the people are unanimous for some budget system. They are crying for some system which will reduce taxation and expenditures. They are crying against the vast number of officeholders who perform very little service for the Government. They are groaning under an increase of salaries, and they demand attention from the House of Representatives.

The people of my State several years ago found to their sorrow that appropriations were vastly increasing, and that revenues without a budget system could not be made to equal the appropriations. The cry went up from the taxpayers of the State for a budget system, which the legislature put into effect, and it is now doing admirable work and keeping the appropriations of the State within the bounds of the revenues.

This budget system of the National Government will not alone serve for the reduction of appropriations and lessening of taxation, but it will serve as a strong adjunct to the Government in that it will provide information for the use of Congress and the various departments, and will always have at hand a vast fund of information for not alone the guidance of the President himself but for Congress and the departments as well. There will be at hand information as to the condition of the Treasury and the opinion of the President as to the needs of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year.

There will be an accounting department of the bureau independent of the executive departments and under the control and direction of the comptroller general of the United States created under this act, and who, together with the assistant comptroller general, is appointed during good behavior until 70 years of age; so that these officers are entirely removed from any political influence or effect of changing administrations. The powers and duties now conferred upon the Comptroller or the Auditor of the Treasury and the auditors of the other departments are vested in the accounting department of the budget bureau.

The comptroller general is required to investigate at the seat of Government and elsewhere the receipts and disbursements of public funds and report the same in writing to Congress at the beginning of each regular session, and shall make such other reports as shall be ordered by Congress or any committee thereof.

It will be seen from these casual observations that the bill is complete in every detail for the provision of a national budget and for the accounting department thereof; that it will lessen largely the demands upon the various departments for information, in that the bureau of the budget will always have it ready at hand. I feel that upon the passage of the bill our Government will be found more efficient economically and otherwise, and that we will see a vast improvement in the finances of the country and in the lessening of taxation. [Applause.]

I sincerely hope this bill will be passed.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, in years past it has been the practice of certain people to buy goods after fashions of other countries. Society women bought hats and dresses made in Paris. Men bought clothes made in England. American-made goods were not good enough for them. Like those people, it is now suggested that we pattern our laws after the laws of foreign countries. Because England, Germany, and other countries have a budget, and few, if any, committees to pass upon appropriations, thus centralizing the power over appropriations, it is suggested that we also have a budget. Personally autocracy never appealed to me. I prefer a democratic form of government and American-made goods.

Now, what is there to this European plan suggested? The two reports would indicate that the budget system is in the interest of economy, to safeguard the Public Treasury, that one committee can accomplish that end better than a number of committees. The definition of a national budget in the report is: "The instrument through which the several financial operations of the Government are correlated, compared one with the other, and brought under examination at one and the same time. * * * It is a document through which the Chief Executive is the authority responsible for the actual conduct of governmental affairs."

As far as the bill goes that, in part, is true; but the report states: "Broadly speaking, a budget system has three distinct phases, namely: (1) The formation of the budget; (2) action on the budget by Congress; (3) supervision and control of the execution of the budget." The contention is that this bill will take care of (1) and (3), but as the report states, (2) can be better accomplished by a change in the rules. To carry this out the chairman of the committee reported H. Res. 324, which provides for a "Committee on Appropriation, consisting of 35 members, which is to be given exclusive authority to report all appropriations and take from the Committees on Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Indian Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Post Office and Post Roads, and Rivers and Harbors the authority now vested in those committees to report appropriations."

If the three propositions are to be included in the budget system, judging from results obtained from national budget policies in other countries, I am compelled to take issue with the committee's definition of a national budget. According to results obtained in other countries it has proven disastrous, hence it can be more clearly defined as a system to make it easier for the greedy and unscrupulous to get their hands into the Public Treasury; to satisfy egotism and ambition; to promote waste, bankruptcy, wreck, ruin, and disaster; to establish autocracy.

One would infer from the statement made that the President is not now responsible for the acts of the members of his Cabinet, but that he would be responsible for the acts of the director of the bureau of budgets. That seems too absurd even to take notice of, as, for instance, the provision in this bill requiring the several executive departments to make and furnish annual estimates and requiring that the estimates be submitted to Congress by the President instead of the Secretary of the Treasury, as the President is responsible for the acts of every member of his Cabinet, of course, adds nothing to his responsibility or to the responsibility of the heads of the executive departments. Cabinet officers are all appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The director of the bureau of budgets would be appointed by the President under the provisions of this bill. Hence, if the President can be held responsible for the acts of the director, he certainly can be held responsible for the acts of the members of his Cabinet.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman read the bill which is before the House?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GARNER. The bill before the House does not require the confirmation of the director of the budget by the Senate.

Mr. HAUGEN. My recollection is that it does.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, no.

Mr. HAUGEN. Whether it does or not, can the President be held responsible for the acts of a clerk in a department drawing $10,000 a year over what he is held for the conduct of a member of his official family, a Cabinet officer? That is the question.

The bill also provides for the transfer of the accounting from the six auditors to the accounting department and for the transfer of the present incumbents—merely a change of title, the same as in the change in submitting estimates, or, in other words, a "camouflage."

Another contention is that the estimates of expenditures, as at present submitted, represents only the desires of the individual departments and bureaus—that these requests have been subjected to no superior revision with the view of bringing them into harmony with each other—that the estimates are the products of bureau chiefs; or, in other words, that the President and those responsible have been derelict in their duties. If so, what an insult to the heads of the departments and to the President! If true, what assurance have we that the estimates will be given more consideration by the heads of the departments and the President if the heads of the departments are required to submit the estimates to the President or the bureau of the budgets instead of through the Secretary of the Treasury, as they are now doing? If they are guilty, as alleged, is not the remedy at the polls or by impeachment, and not in the proposed change, more properly designated a "camouflage."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand the view of the gentleman, he considers that under this bill the President will decline to assume responsibility, just as he does now?

Mr. HAUGEN. Others may so contend, but I have never assumed that any President of this Government has neglected his duty. I can not believe that any President is guilty of such a charge.

Having some knowledge of how business is conducted in the departments, more particularly in the Department of Agriculture, I can not believe that any President or Cabinet officer would be guilty of any such charge. I can not believe that anybody who is sufficiently trained in business and of a capacity to run a peanut stand, or even a peanut politician, would lay himself open to any such charge.

The gentleman, the author of the bill and report [Mr. GOOD], in his opening remarks pointed out that under our present system, since 1866, in 41 out of 52 years, the revenue exceeded the expenditures. That statement clearly contradicts the contention made in the report.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman believe now that the President of the United States undertakes to supervise or investigate the various requisitions upon Congress submitted through the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not only think so, but I know that he does. The gentleman knows, and everyone who has given this matter consideration knows, that the estimates are now submitted to the President and Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury. It matters not whether they are submitted direct or through the Secretary of the Treasury to the President. The estimates are generally taken up in the Cabinet meetings. The Secretaries of the departments present their plans and estimates. They are discussed and finally amounts are determined upon. If the estimates exceed the amount determined upon by the President and his Cabinet, the respective Secretaries must make the necessary reduction required to bring them within the aggregate amount fixed.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that the various items contained in the Book of Estimates sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury are taken up in the Cabinet meeting and each item is scrutinized and considered by the Cabinet?

Mr. HAUGEN. The Cabinet first discusses the estimates and determines what the budget, or, rather, what the amount of expenditures, shall be. Then the respective Secretaries take up the matter with their bureau chiefs, who make estimates for the bureaus to the Secretaries. The various estimates are gone over, scrutinized, and revised by the Secretaries, and generally sent back to the bureau chiefs with the direction that they be brought within the limit fixed by the Secretary. When revised accordingly the Secretaries submit them to the President. They are again given consideration by the President and members of his Cabinet. When the estimates are finally determined upon the Secretaries must bring their estimates within the amounts fixed. They are then submitted, through the Secretary of the Treasury, to Congress. It matters not whether you call it a budget or an estimate, it amounts to the same thing. Whether this is done in all instances I do not know, but anything short of it is gross dereliction of duty. Any President or Cabinet, whoever they may be, doing less than this should not be trusted with running even a corner grocery store, much less the largest business institution in the world.

Mr. GARNER. How does the gentleman account for the fact that ex-President Taft and President Woodrow Wilson and Secretary Glass and other members of the Cabinet take issue with that statement and ask for this specific legislation? How does the gentleman account for that fact that they want this kind of legislation if they are now doing what he says this bill will require to be done?

Mr. HAUGEN. As to the duty and responsibility resting upon the President and his Cabinet, the Constitution provides that the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States. It also provides that the President shall from time to time give to the Congress information as to the state of the Union and recommend for its consideration such measures as he may judge necessary and expedient. So, then, there is no question as to his duty, authority, or responsibility. Furthermore, the bill does not propose a change of power granted under the Constitution. The report so states; besides it is not in the power of Congress to change the Constitution. So, as before stated, if he fails to do his duty, the remedy is with the people on election day or by impeachment, and not in the change of titles.

As to the question, "Have the executive department and Congress done their duty?" If they have not, who is to blame? As before stated by my colleague, Mr. GOOD, the revenue exceeded the expenditures in 41 out of the last 52 years, which is evidence that both have done fairly well, certainly much better than other nations under a system such as is here proposed. Some departments and some Congresses may have been slack and derelict in their duties, but that is no reason for condemning the system as a whole. As to the charge made against the Executive and Congress, my understanding is that generally heads of departments and committees pursue their duties with industry, fidelity, intelligence, and rectitude to purpose. I know that the committee of which I have the honor to be a member works early and late, not on an eight-hour schedule but much of the time 16 hours a day. The Committee on Agriculture generally meets at 10 o'clock in the morning and sits until 6 o'clock.

Weeks and months are given to the consideration and preparation of appropriation bills. Reports of the hearings held on the appropriations cover several hundred pages. One report, I believe, covered more than 1,700 pages. Bills reported by that committee are not, as alleged in the report on this bill, the estimates made by the bureau chiefs. In the Department of Agriculture estimates are first submitted by the chiefs of the bureaus to the Secretary. They are scrutinized and revised and sent back to the bureaus with instructions to be revised and made to conform with the budget determined for the department by the Secretary. When revised and incorporated in the budget determined by the Secretary, as before stated, it is sent to the President. The President and the Cabinet give it, as all other budgets, consideration. Finally a national budget or national estimate—whatever you may prefer to call it—is determined upon and submitted, through the Secretary of the Treasury, to Congress, where it is divided and referred to the respective committees having jurisdiction over appropriations. There they are again carefully scrutinized and considered. Take, for instance, the appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the current year. Owing to the delay in forwarding the estimates the committee did not begin its hearings until January 3, concluding them on January 22. It was then given consideration by the subcommittee and again considered by the whole committee. The bill passed the House on February 1, again on June 4, and a third time on July 18, and was finally signed on July 24.

In making up the bill for the current year, here is what was done in the office of the Secretary, which comes first in the bill: The office estimate was $513,000. The Secretary in submitting it reduced it to $491,000. The committee cut the Secretary's estimate $21,570. In the Weather Bureau, which comes next, it's estimate was $1,912,000. The Secretary made it $1,906.000 and the committee cut that amount $51,540. The Bureau of Plant Industry estimate was $3,500,000. The Secretary made it $3,294,000 and the committee reduced it $80,640. The Bureau of Chemistry estimated $1,838,000. The Secretary made it $1,611,000 and the committee reduced his estimate $248,600. The Bureau of Markets estimate to the Secretary was $3,723,000. The Secretary made it $3,131,000 and the committee reduced his estimate $452,750. Thus all along the line. The total estimates for routine and ordinary work made by the bureau chiefs to the Secretary was $34,850,366. The Secretary made it $33,149,286 and the Committee on Agriculture reduced it to $29,847,162. The Secretary cut the estimates of the chiefs of the bureaus $1,701,080 and the committee cut the Secretary's estimates $3,302,124. The grand total estimates for the Department of Agriculture by the bureau chiefs was $36,694,766; the Secretary, $34,993,686; reported by the committee, $31,691,562. Does that represent the views of the bureau chiefs? No, gentlemen. Let us abide by the facts. In bringing this bill before the House, why not state the facts? The contention is that the President, Secretaries of the departments, and the committees have been derelict in their duties. Gentlemen, I am not going to criticize the members of any committee. I have no quarrel with the Committee on Appropriations. The members of that committee enjoy the respect and admiration of this House. It is made up with men of intelligence, industry, as high a class of men as you can find, performing their duty with fidelity and rectitude of purpose; but they are overworked now. Much of the time they work night and day. Compare their reports with the reports of committees having more time to give to the consideration of bills. If there is anything that the House is opposed to, if there is anything we have contended against it is lump-sum appropriations. Our committee started the fight some years ago. It has grown inch by inch until it has become a popular proposition. What are the results? The Agricultural appropriation bill carried $33,900,211 and 6,033 positions were on the statutory roll. The Committee on Appropriations brought in the sundry civil. It carried $607,160,207.95, and only 1,600 positions were on the statutory roll.

I find that the following seven bills were reported by the Committee on Appropriations carried the amounts as follows:

Fortifications	$11,214,291.00
Pensions	215,030,000.00
Sundry civil	607,160,207.95
Second deficiency (1919)	292,714,084.71
Third deficiency (1919)	24,325,929.40
Railroad deficiency	750,000,000.00
War-risk insurance and pension deficiency	45,044,500.00
	1,945,489,013.06

The total number of clerks carried on the statutory rolls in these seven bills were 2,281.

The appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture was reported by the Committee on Agriculture. It carried $33,900,211 and 6,033 clerks on the statutory rolls.

The appropriation reported by the Committee on Agriculture in the Agricultural appropriation bill is only 1.7 per cent of the appropriation reported by the Committee on Appropriations in the seven bills enumerated above, while the number of clerks carried on the statutory rolls in the Agricultural appropriation bill is nearly three times the number of clerks carried on the statutory rolls in the seven bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman in reading the number of clerks on the statutory roll said an appropriation of $1,900,000,000 and 2,200 clerks. I think the gentleman made a mistake and meant to say 22,000 clerks.

Mr. HAUGEN. I said $1,945,489,013.06 and 2,281 clerks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And put the number of clerks at 2,200 on the statutory roll. Did not the gentleman make a mistake, and should it not be 22,000?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well——

Mr. HAUGEN. I said 2,281 clerks were carried on the statutory roll in the seven bills reported by the overworked Committee on Appropriations, as compared with 6,033 on the statutory roll in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what the gentleman stated.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is correct.

House resolution 324 not only gives the one committee of 35 members exclusive jurisdiction over all appropriations, but, in order to carry out the scheme to give absolute control, bars other committees, with few exceptions, from the privilege of reporting bills carrying appropriations.

The amendment proposed to Rule XII provides that, with few exceptions, no bill or joint resolution carrying an appropriation shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction, nor shall an amendment proposing an appropriation be in order, and so forth. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors is permitted to report at any time bills authorizing the improvement of rivers and harbors; the Committee on Invalid Pensions general pension bills. If this amendment is adopted bills authorizing the distribution of pork are privileged under the rule, but legislation by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, aside from general pension bills, to care for or to help the soldiers is barred. The door is also closed to legislation from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, now having jurisdiction over war-risk insurance and compensation matters for soldiers. It is barred to legislation from the Committee on Agriculture.

The door is closed to legislation from the Committees on Labor and Education and swung wide open to the pork barrel, so frequently characterized as graft.

It is no secret that more intense and determined opposition has been centered against the bills appropriating a few million dollars for agriculture, labor, and education than against other bills carrying many times the amounts.

If the amendments to the rules are adopted it will result in the farmer, laborer, and the Bureau of Education, as well as numerous other interests, not only being placed at the mercy of the Committee on Appropriations, but they will be barred under the rule like in days gone by when Members on bended knees with tears in their eyes approached the throne pleading and begging for an opportunity to have bills brought up for consideration. Gentlemen, why open the doors to certain ones and exclude others? Are not the soldiers, the farmers, the laborers, and others entitled to some consideration? They are good enough to vote. Why close the doors to them? Why pat them on the back on election day and close the doors to the Halls of Congress to them later? Why monopolize without end?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman point out in the resolution where any attempt is made to change the rules of the House with regard to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. HAUGEN. I was reading from the resolution, quoting from the gentleman's resolution.

Mr. GOOD. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is not mentioned.

Mr. HAUGEN. They are not given the privilege to report.

Mr. GOOD. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is not mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. HAUGEN. It bars all committees except those enumerated in the bill.

I will quote from the resolution, House resolution 324, page 2, line 15:

16. The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, namely: The Committee on Rules, on rules, joint rules, and order of business; the Committee on Elections, on the right of a Member to his seat; the Committee on Ways and Means, on bills raising revenue; the Committee on Appropriations, the general appropriation bills; the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, bills authorizing the improvement of rivers and harbors; the Committee on Public Lands, bills for the forfeiture of land grants to railroad and other corporations, bills preventing speculation in the public lands, and bills for the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers; the Committee on the Territories, bills for the admission of new States; the Committee on Enrolled Bills, enrolled bills; the Committee on Invalid Pensions, general pension bills; the Committee on Printing, on all matters referred to them of printing for the use of the House or two Houses; and the Committee on Accounts, on all matters of expenditure of the contingent fund of the House.

Rule XXI, add an additional clause as follows:

"5. No bill or joint resolution carrying appropriations shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations, nor shall an amendment proposing an appropriation be in order during the consideration of a bill or joint resolution reported by a committee not having that jurisdiction. A question of order on an appropriation in any such bill, joint resolution, or amendment thereto may be raised at any time."

I will also quote from the gentleman's report on the resolution proposing changes in the rules of the House, page 3:

The resolution makes three important changes in the rules of the House, viz:

(1) It centers in one Committee on Appropriations, composed of 35 members, the authority to report all appropriations, and takes from the Committee on Agriculture, Committee on Foreign Affairs, Committee on Indian Affairs, Committee on Military Affairs, Committee on Naval Affairs, Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and the Rivers and Harbors Committee the authority now vested in those committees to report appropriations. * * *

(3) It permits the raising of a point of order at any time on any appropriation item carried in any bill or joint resolution reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations.

It is at once apparent that the principal change proposed in the rules of the House is the one centering all appropriations in a single committee. This change was strongly urged by practically every person who appeared before the committee as being a very important and necessary step, if in the future appropriations are to be made with intelligence and economy.

It may be that one committee of 35 members can do more and better work than eight committees with a total membership of more than 150, but results obtained fail to support that contention. I say that not in an offensive way. No; I know the make-up of that great committee. As before stated, each member enjoys the confidence and respect of the House; all are men of intelligence and integrity, doing their very best; but the fact is that it is a physical impossibility for that committee to give the required time and consideration to all items contained in bills coming under their jurisdiction. Hence, the work must necessarily be divided and disposed of by subcommittees, and little, if any, consideration can be given to each item by the whole committee. If the committee is already overworked, it seems absurd to assume that in addition to what it is now doing it can take on the work now being performed by seven committees.

Now, a word as to economy. Has the one committee or no committee, under the budget policy resulted in economy in other countries? England has tried it; other European countries have tried it. What are the results? England is now on the verge of bankruptcy; its people, staggering under its death-dealing blows. England is turning the heavens and earth to get away from it, to adopt the American system, one that has worked so well and which it is now proposed to discard. England is making headway. After years of fierce struggle, she succeeded on February 19, 1918, in appointing a select committee to examine, recommend, and report as to a proper policy to take the place of its vicious, autocractic budget policy. I have a copy of the select committee's report. As a starter, that committee reports not in favor of one committee, as suggested in this bill, but of two to begin with, and that this number should be added to if found desirable.

Sidney Webb, professor of public administration in the University of London, School of Economics and Political Science, in his reply to a question asked by the committees, favors not one committee—an autocratic power as suggested here—but states that for the purpose there should be appointed a standing committee for each of the 13 great divisions of government. So, according to the select committee and Dr. Webb, we should have not one committee, as suggested here, or eight appropriation committees, as we now have, but several committees, or one for each of the 10 departments. To that might be added others, as, for instance, one for the executive department, and so on. Undoubtedly a committee on appropriations for each department, as we now have on expenditures in each department, would result in a saving and great benefit. It goes without saying that committees having jurisdiction pertaining to the departments, committees drafting laws and who come in more frequent contact with the departments, have more intimate knowledge of their requirements than a committee giving all its time to appropriations. As to the advisability of one or more committees and as to the results of the budget system in Europe, I refer you to the ninth report from the select committee on national expenditures, together with the appendix ordered by the House of Commons to be printed October 22, 1918. According to it, though wide difference of opinion exists in England as to whether committees should have jurisdiction over both estimates and accounts, practically all agree that the present method for securing parliamentary control of expenditures is inadequate and favor the establishment of from 1 to 13 committees on expenditures.

I have a copy of a publication entitled "The Nineteenth Century," of August, 1917, in which Mr. J. A. R. Marriott refers to the vicious budget policy. On page 346 he quotes Sir Tudor Walters: "Ministers must not imagine that they * * * are possessed of some divine and supreme power. * * * We want to restore to the House of Commons not merely the right to audit the expenses that are being incurred but to control the financial policy and expenditure of the country." And states: "Such language, reechoed from every quarter of the House, proceeding indifferently from conservative, radical, and labor members, possesses no inconsiderate significance." On page 346 he quotes Mr. T. Gibson Bowles: "A close study of British finance can not but conclude that the vast increase in our national expenditure does, on the whole, mainly arise from * * * a disregard of economies, a contempt for frugality, and a lavish, wasteful, wanton, and unnecessary expenditure all around." Does that sound like economy? On 351 he states: "Can it be hoped that we shall ever get back to sound methods of finance, or that we shall ever reestablish the effective control of the House of Commons over expenditure so long as financial responsibility is divorced from political power? There is, however, general agreement that unless we are to drift toward disaster that control must be reestablished." He further states that the act of 1866, the budget policy, is a corner stone of the existing edifice. On 353 he states: "Plainly the first step to be taken is to insure a real and not merely a formal examination of the estimates. But a real examination is not possible at the hands of the whole House, nor, indeed, at the hands of any smaller body—such as a select committee * * * the estimates should be closely scrutinized by a committee or by a series of committees—one for each class of votes—especially appointed for this purpose and charged to make a report to the House before the estimates are approved in committee of supply." On 354: "We want, therefore, not only an estimates committee but also a committee whose duty it shall be to examine the financial aspect of every bill which involves the expenditure of public money—a committee which shall have the power to examine ministers and permanent officials and shall make a detailed report to the House before it goes into committee on the bill. * * * Is it not demonstrably true that much of the waste of public money which we are deploring to-day is due to overhaste in legislation?" Is overhaste desired? If so, one committee. On 355 he states: "The ancient machinery must be adapted to modern processes of production. Unless the adaptation is made, and made quickly, nothing but disaster can ensue." And further quotes President Lowell, of Harvard, who, after referring to the "growing practice of delegating legislative power," adds: "We hear much talk about the need for the devolution of the power of Parliament on subordinate representative bodies, but the tendency is not mainly in that direction. * * * The real defection has been in favor of the administrative departments of the central Government, and this" (as Mr. Lowell justly observes) "involves a striking departure from Anglo-Saxon traditions with a distinct approach to the practice of continental countries." On 357 he states: "Neither the existing House of Commons nor the more responsible organ of public opinion will allow matters to remain as they are. Nor is any time to be lost." On 358: "It is of supreme importance to them that their representatives in the House of Commons should, without delay, take the necessary steps for regaining that control over the spending departments of the Government which they have allowed to slip out of their fingers." The article is signed Mr. J. A. R. Marriott and is followed by a footnote, which reads as follows: "Since this article went to press the Government have settled the terms of reference to the select committee which is to be set up immediately—the terms which follow closely the line in the above pages."

Here is what the press and some of England's most eminent people have to say about the inferior autocratic budget policy. I quote from the London Times, Friday, August 8, 1919:

"ROAD TO RUIN—FINANCIAL PERIL ADMITTED—ECONOMY AND WORK THE ONLY HOPE—'DIRECT ACTION IS TREASON.'

"The House of Commons turned its attention to-day to the great and serious questions of the reestablishment of the authority and control of Parliament and the finanical position of the kingdom. Mr. Chamberlain insisted that the good will and active assistance of every class in the community were needed to save the situation. If we continued spending as we were spending now, and if we did not increase production beyond the rate at which we were producing now, the end would be national bankruptcy. He repeated that the Government as a whole were seized with the seriousness of the position and had set their minds to find a remedy. There was nothing in the situation, he added, that was beyond our control, if we tackled it as a nation with the same resolution, public spirit, and unity with which we had faced and overcome the difficulties of the war."

Gentlemen, there is your economy. There is the situation under a budget system. As before stated, under it, under the lump-sum appropriations, it is easier for the grafter to get his hands in the Public Treasury. If that is what is desired, the budget system and the reduction of the number of committees will undoubtedly do that.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman state whether the showing made is to the effect that the budget system is responsible for the unfavorable financial condition in England?

Mr. HAUGEN. They have been experimenting with it since 1866. They are getting away from the system. As long as Gladstone held the reins they got along fairly well; but they are rapidly approaching bankruptcy as the result of it.

Mr. KINKAID. Is not their financial condition due to the war?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not entirely.

Mr. KINKAID. And is not the budget system merely a coexistent condition?

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will read this report—and I will have part of it inserted—it will satisfy the gentleman it is not a matter of the war. On page 9 it states:

These questions relate to normal conditions and not to the state of war.

I will quote from the ninth report from the select committee on national expenditure, to which I referred a few moments ago.

Page 2 gives the order of reference. It states that on February 19, 1918, it was ordered that a select committee be appointed—

"To examine the current expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by Parliament and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the Government may be effected therein.

"To make recommendations in regard to the form of public accounts, the system of control within the departments and by the treasury, and the procedure of this house in relation to supply and appropriation, so as to secure more effective control by Parliament over public expenditure."

Page 3. It reports: "The select committee on national expenditure have made progress in the matters to them referred so far as relates to the procedure of the House in relation to supply and appropriation and have agreed to the following ninth report. * * * The subcommittee decided to proceed by way of written question and answer. They framed a questionnaire, which was sent to Mr. Speaker, the chairman of ways and means and the deputy chairman, to the chancellor of the exchequer and the ex-chancellors, to the financial secretary to the treasury and the ex-financial secretaries, to certain other members of the house representative of parties, to the comptroller and auditor general, to certain government officials, and to a small number of others whose views it was thought desirable to ascertain. We present in the appendix to this report the questions and the replies, together with a synopsis. Those questions and replies related to the normal conditions of times of peace, and this report relates to them also. * * * The replies show, with few exceptions, a consensus of opinion that the present system of parliamentary control over expenditures is inadequate. In that view we concur. Indeed our terms of reference themselves, inviting proposals to render control more effective, indicate that the house is not satisfied with the existing procedure. * * * Under these conditions it is not surprising that there has not been a single instance in the last 25 years when the House of Commons by its own direct action has reduced on financial grounds any estimate submitted to it.

* * * Yet it can not be contended that there is never an occasion in any year or under any head on which proposals for expenditure could with advantage be reviewed and amended."

Page 4 states: "We consider that the House of Commons, as the representative of the taxpayer, should reassert fully and effectively its right of restricting the amounts to be allotted for each head of the national expenditure, and we recommend the adoption of the measures to that end which we now proceed to detail."

Standing committees on estimates: "The great majority of the replies to the questions which were circulated favor the principle that the estimates should be subjected to examination by a select committee. Among those who express that view are all the officers of the House who were consulted—Mr. Speaker, the chairman of ways and means, the deputy chairman, and the clerk of the house. We are unanimously of the same opinion.

"We recommend that at the beginning of each session there should be appointed, by the customary procedure, two standing committees on estimates, each consisting of 15 members. After some experience of the working of these committees it may be found desirable to add a third.

"We have considered the alternative of a single committee with a larger membership, which should divide itself into a number of subcommittees, each dealing with one department or group of departments, but we have arrived at the conclusion that for the purpose in view the balance of advantage lies against this method."

Page 5 (S. C. on E.) states: "The estimates committee of 1912, 1913, and 1914 was appointed in pursuance of a recommendation of the Select Committee on National Expenditures of 1902–3. It rendered useful service, but its usefulness was impaired by three causes.

"First, the task imposed upon it was too large for a single body to perform; it was able to consider each year only a fraction of the estimates; its examination of the votes of any particular department was rather an exceptional incident than a normal part of the financial procedure; the departments knew that once their estimates had been considered it would probably be from 7 to 10 years before they were considered again. Our proposals for two committees, and, if experience shows it to be desirable, for the addition of a third, should go far to remove this drawback, particularly if each of the committees were expected to give as much time as might be necessary to enable it to cover each session a large part of the whole field."

Do you want estimates examined once in 10 years? If so, have one committee as proposed here. That is your one committee budget system. That is your autocratic form of government proposed here.

On page 8 the committee gives its conclusions and recommendations:

"We are of the opinion that the existing procedure of the House of Commons is inadequate to secure proper parliamentary control over the national expenditure. We recommend that there should be appointed each session two standing committees on estimates, each consisting of 15 members, and that a third should be added if experience showed that this was desirable."

Page 9, Appendix. Questions relating to the procedure of the House of Commons on matters of finance and the replies received thereto. List of questions: (These questions relate to normal conditions and not to the state of war.)

"1. Do you consider that the present methods for securing parliamentary control over expenditure are adequate?

"2. If not, do you regard the appended proposal for the establishment of a standing committee on estimates and accounts as the right line of reform?

"3. Have you any modifications to suggest to that proposal?"

Page 10. Reply from Mr. Speaker:

"1. I do not consider the present methods tend to economy. The House of Commons has become one of the chief spending departments of the State.

"2. I believe that a committee on estimates, selected from among the real advocates of economy, would have a salutary effect.

"3. It is a mistake to combine the public accounts committee and the estimates committee. The function of the latter is to criticize the vote of money necessary for a particular service; the function of the former is to see that the money voted has been spent in the manner intended."

Page 11. Reply from the Right Hon. Sir Donald McLean, K. B. E., deputy chairman of ways and means:

"2. I think that a committee on estimates is a very good idea."

Page 14. Reply from the Right Hon. T. McKinnon Wood:

"2. Yes. It is quite impossible for so large a body as the committee of the whole house adequately to consider details of estimates, and I think that it is necessary to adopt the standing committee system if anything like effective control over the spending departments is to be exercised by the House of Commons. Such control will in the future be of extreme importance."

Page 15. Reply from the Right Hon. Walter Runciman, M. P.:

"In reply to your inquiry I have to say that, after considering the tentative proposal of your committee that greater economy in the expenditure of public moneys should be secured by means of a standing committee on estimates, set up as a microcosm of the House of Commons, somewhat on the lines laid down by your committee. I could not give more than general approval of this suggestion, for in some details it seems to me expedient to make modifications.

"I do not hold the view that a committee set up for this purpose would lead to pressure for increased rather than for decreased expenditure, but if that tendency is to be feared safeguards against it can be provided from the first."

Page 18. Reply from the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, M. P.:

"With reference to question 1, the reply is definitely in the negative, and in reply to Nos. 2, 3, and 4, while not committing the party to every detail in the proposal for a standing committee, broadly it is on right lines. It may be stated, however, that in our opinion 26 members would not be sufficient to do the work contemplated."

Reply from the Right Hon. J. W. Gulland, M. P., page 19:

"1. No; I think the present methods very inadequate.

"2. The committee as proposed would be one useful line of reform.

"3 and 4. It entirely depends on how this committee is worked. If it is energetic it could be of enormous use, but it all depends upon the work and spirit that is put into it."

Page 20. Reply from James Parker, Esq., M. P.:

"If parliamentary control is to be really effective the estimates of every department should, in my opinion, be considered by a committee before they are sanctioned by the house."

Page 22. Note by Sir H. J. Gibson, K. C. B. (comptroller and auditor general):

"While supporting the establishment of a standing committee on estimates as well as on accounts, I am strongly of the opinion that they should be separate and not combined, though some members should serve on both."

Page 24. Reply from T. Gibson Bowles, Esq.:

"Both the expenditure to be provided for and the actual expenditure itself are uncontrolled. In the true sense there is no public finance left. Nor will there be nor can there be any restoration thereof, either during the war or for long after. The waste, the squandering, the fraud, and the terrible irregularities of all sorts now proceeding and inevitable in war will then come under review, as they did after the Boer War in the public accounts committee, whereof I was then a member."

Page 26. Reply from Sidney Webb, Esq., professor of public administration in the University of London (School of Economics and Political Science):

"No one committee could set itself to control policy in general. What seems required is a series of standing committees, to be appointed by the committee of selection at the beginning of each Parliament mainly from among members interesting themselves especially in the particular subject and serving for the whole term of the Parliament—this not necessarily excluding a formal reappointment and filling of vacancies each session—each committee charged with the continuous oversight of what is actually being done in one of the 13 fundamental branches of our Government at its present stage, namely, foreign affairs, defense, finance, justice, the promotion of material production, communication and transport, the regulation of employment, education, health, the administration of India and that of the dominions and dependencies, supplies and research."

Page 27. Reply from Sidney Webb, suggesting 13 committees.

"To sum up, I propose:

"1. That the House of Commons should insist on a marked distinction being made between the oversight of policy and the art or technique of administration.

"2. That the House should organize its own work so as to be able to exercise such a continuous oversight of all the ministries or departments as will enable it to secure the execution of the policy that it has prescribed, and no other.

"3. That for this purpose there should be appointed a standing committee for each of the 13 great divisions of government, the various ministries or departments concerned with each such division being required to supply, continuously and automatically, the information necessary to enable the committee to satisfy itself that the prescribed policy is being carried out efficiently and therefore with genuine economy."

Page 28, Part III. Synopsis of replies received to the questions submitted by the subcommittee on procedure.

To question 1:

"The House 'has become one of the chief spending departments of the State.' (Mr. Speaker.)

"It is impossible for the House as a whole to have any effective knowledge of the countless details of expenditure. (Sir Charles Hobhouse, Mr. McKinnon Wood.)

"Debate in Committee of the Whole House is an unsuitable method. It reflects current opinion, which may be economical or the reverse. (Sir C. Ilbert.)

"It is diffuse and inconclusive, and in any case is concerned with policy and not with the amount of expenditure. (Sir Sydney Olivier, Mr. Hayes-Fisher, Sir William Gibbons.)"

To question 2:

"Unqualified (or practically unqualified) approval is expressed by the chairman of ways and means, Sir Courtenay Ilbert, Mr. McKinnon Wood, Mr. Hayes-Fisher, Mr. James Parker, Mr. Arthur Henderson, Mr. Boland, Sir Sydney Olivier, Sir William Gibbons, and Mr. Harold Cox. Approval in general terms, but subject to important reservations, by Mr. Speaker, Sir Donald McLean, Mr. Runciman, Sir Charles Hobhouse, Mr. Acland, Mr. Gulland, and Sir Charles Harris. Mr. Asquith would have no objection to seeing the experiment tried."

Gentlemen, England has tried this since 1866. She has given it a fair trial. As a result she is on the verge of helpless bankruptcy. The report gives the conclusions of this committee, a committee that has given this matter years of thought and consideration. Are we to pattern after England? Are we not drifting into debt fast enough?

I will include a few clippings from the London Times. The Times' report of the debate in the House of Commons, June, 1919:

"NATIONAL EXPENDITURE—THE QUESTION OF CONTROL.

"Mr. H. Samuel stated that it was right to say at the outset that they had found the chancellor of the exchequer and the Government departments very ready to adopt the suggestions which the select committee had made. So far from resenting them, they had, as a rule, really welcomed the committee's suggestions, because they realized that the committee had not been seeking opportunities for attack, but only seeking opportunities to be of assistance. There was a small number of outstanding questions as to which the Government had not met the suggestions of the committee or had met them only in a partial and insufficient degree. * * * He complained of the war office attitude to the committee on expenditure in regard to the military staff of the war office. The committee had recommended last December that the war office should hold an inquiry of its own into the question of the increase in the staff.

"MR. BONAR LAW'S REPLY.

"The chancellor of the exchequer: I can assure the members of my right honorable friend's committee that it is through no feeling of discourtesy to them that I rise now before they have taken their part in the debate. * * * It is the duty of the chancellor of the exchequer, more than anyone else, to welcome any measure by which greater control and some chance of saving can be secured in this immense expenditure. For that reason I welcomed the appointment of this committee. I welcomed it on the understanding, which has been adhered to, that it would be set up for the purpose of helping in this matter and not for the purpose of finding material with which to criticize the Government. There is a real danger that in dealing with this big question we may be so lost in details that we shall not be able to see the wood on account of the trees, and it is the business of the House to look at the larger aspects as well as the smaller aspects of this question. The Government have tried to carry out the recommendations of this committee."

The Times, Friday, August 29, 1919:

"WHITEHALL PURGE—RUTHLESS REDUCTION AT WAR OFFICE—NATIONAL SHIPYARD SCANDAL.

"Our correspondent at Chepstow calls attention to the waste of between four and five millions of money there at the National Shipbuilding Yards. In two years two ships have been launched. Mr. Clynes, speaking last night at Widnes, denounced the Government's extravagance and waste. * * * On top of Mr. Lloyd-George's letter to his colleagues has come a circular from the treasury addressed to the permanent heads of each state department, asking them to look into affairs and to effect economies in every possible direction."

The Times, Thursday, September 4, 1919:

"THE ENFORCEMENT OF ECONOMY.

"To the EDITOR OF THE TIMES:

"SIR: Mr. Mason thinks the suggestions made by Mr. Grant and myself for the control of expenditures beside the mark. His panacea is a change of Government, a remedy which suggests political partisanship rather than a genuine desire for economy. Those of us who are chiefly concerned to see good government restored look beyond the present 'hustle,' with its waste, its injustice, and its inevitable reaction. We want to see a system established which will insure that projected economies, as well as projected expenditures, receive careful and instructed consideration. Flying visits of inspection, letters from high places, week-end decisions on hastily thrown together reports, will not effect our objects. They can only be secured by intimate inside knowledge. But that knowledge must be independent of the department, or its possessor will inevitably be hampered by that spirit which exists in all great concerns, and which, at its best, appears as 'esprit de corps,' at its worst as departmental jealousy. I have advocated the appointment of a treasury official in each of the great spending departments, and if your correspondent is correct something of the kind is about to be carried out. If this should be the case, the new officials should, as a matter of course, report from time to time to the select committee on national expenditure. I am, sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN."

"To the EDITOR OF THE TIMES:

"SIR: The long and short of it is the country has got to meet a bill by March 31 next of one thousand six hundred millions and will only have six hundred millions with which to meet it. Will Lord Fisher or anyone else be kind enough to tell us how this is to be done? Will the prime minister or the chancellor of the exchequer or Mr. Bonar Law tell us? I have been looking at your columns every day for this, but 'there is neither voice nor any that answered.' Are the English, who have shown themselves heroes in war, to be cowards in peace? Are our statesmen and generals and admirals, who have shown themselves invincible in battle, now to cringe and to cower before the calamity of insolvency, destitution, and want, and not to be able to point a way of safety from the self-accusing conscience of the nation which will save our self-respect and at the same time honor our acceptances? * * * I was addressing a multitude in the open air upon this question the other day, and a man afterwards came up to me and said that he did not think he could draw his pension conscientiously any longer, and he had determined to seek some useful occupation. That is the spirit of noble independence and self-sacrifice which peace demands of us, and unless we, as a nation, can show the same fortitude and valor now that we did in the war we shall deserve to sink into the same infamy and disgrace as did the ancient empires of the world. Mr Hoover's very plain speaking about the 'stoppage of credit' is quite sufficient warning of what is coming upon us. * * * There is no doubt this country can pay its way in time, but if its throat is to be cut just when it is beginning to breathe, we might just as well all have been destroyed in the recent war. Is it not perfectly futile to talk about houses for the working classes when we can not get the fuel with which to make the cement or the bricks—fuel which we shall want this winter for our very existence? When the nation can not pay its way, it is pure lunacy to launch out into a national transport system and the nationalization of coal mines, which will cost many millions. A man with a bankruptcy petition on the file against him might just as well talk about buying a new house or building a yacht.

"Yours, obediently,

"EDMUND KIMBER."

Does that indicate economy under the autocratic budget system? I leave it to you, gentlemen.

I have a number of other clippings from press reports. I shall not read from them further than their headlines:

The Times, Tuesday, September 2, 1919: "Control of expenditure."

The Times, Saturday, August 9, 1919: "The road to ruin—State extravagance—Ministers' fears—New estimates in the autumn."

The Times, Wednesday, August 13, 1919: "Extravagance: the Government's apologies."

The Times, Monday, September 1, 1919: "Treasury control—A return to sound practice."

The Times, Saturday, September 20, 1919: "The public purse—Responsibility for control."

That is what the people of England think of the budget policy and no committee, or few committees, to review an appropriation. They have tried it. They are staggering under it. England is doing all it can to get away from the vicious, autocratic system, and is patterning after our system. We are expected here to adopt a system tried, discarded, and discredited in other countries.

I will also quote from the Economist.

In the issue of November 30, 1918, page 739, George Hamilton in an article stated:

"The nonperformance of these duties will ultimately land the country in insolvency or to infringe upon the present prerogatives of the chancellor of the exchequer and the treasury by associating with them a capable cooperation, and by obtaining effective economy preserve national solvency. * * * I further contended in my letter that it was policy and not accountancy which alone can regulate and control national expenditure. If committees were established on the lines I suggested they would very much resemble the parliamentary bureaus of the French assembly, and these bureaus investigate expenditure before and not after it is sanctioned. My suggestions, therefore, would put some limitation on the powers which the chancellor of the exchequer, the treasury, and the House of Commons as a whole are now supposed to exercise, but it is because they are incompetent adequately to discharge this duty, and their incompetency is generally acknowledged, that it becomes necessary to substitute an effective machinery for that which from experience we know has failed and will continue to fail."

In the issue of December 7, 1918, page 776, Constitution Hill states:

"No tinkering with the constitution of the treasury will prevent the elect of modern democracy from spending public money."

In the issue of May 10, 1919, page 776, under an article entitled "This year, next year, some time——?" appears the following:

"'Neither this year nor next year nor perhaps the year after will be entirely normal, and in considering what our policy ought to be, I am driven to the hazardous experiment of casting my mind forward into the future to an imaginary normal year.' (The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

"We may perhaps be doing an injustice by a comparison of the chancellor's finance with an almost passive religious piety, but there is about his speech—even about his exhortations to economy—a painful suggestion that things have gone far beyond his control, and a despairing hopelessness of any rapid improvement in the attitude of Parliament toward expenditure. * * * Hesitation in assuming that Parliament will show any respect for economy is natural and indeed inevitable, but it would be much better for the chancellor, instead of saying, 'I assume, though I have no right to assume, that you will be good boys,' to say to the House of Commons, 'So long as I am at the treasury you have got to behave yourselves.' In other matters the Government has not shown much respect for the independence or the importance of this House of Commons, and if firmness and dictation are wanted anywhere it is in the realm of finance that the need is most urgent. * * * Then we have in this hypothetical budget a debt charge of £400,000,000. This figure compares with an actual estimate of £360,000,000 for the current year, leaving a difference of £40,000,000 as the charge on subsequent borrowing. Here again results must depend on exertion and economy, and until revenue covers expenditure £400,000,000 will unhappily remain a hypothetical figure. How much more the State will have to incur through housing, redemption of debt, and loss on exchange is not clear, but we shall probably be fortunate if Mr. Chamberlain's estimate is not exceeded."

Here you have the result of the budget policy of England. Is it what is desired in our country?

"In the issue of May 17, 1919, page 797, under an article entitled 'Waste,' appears the following: 'Every now and then the select committee on expenditure or the auditor general lifts the veil for a moment and shows us a few striking instances of how Government officials have played ducks and drakes with the public money. * * * But we doubt whether the public have ever been given such startling revelations of the way in which their money has been thrown in the gutter as it provided by a report on the ministry of munitions issued this week by the comptroller and auditor general. Ten columns would hardly suffice if we were to give all the paragraphs in this report which refer to extensive official delinquencies, and we advise our readers to purchase the document for themselves. It is numbered 79 and may be obtained for 6d. at His Majesty's Stationery Office or through any bookseller. * * * We have not the space to pursue further this tragic catalogue of sins against the taxpayer. * * * We can not now save these millions that have already gone down the sink. But the plea that it is no good crying over spilt milk or shutting the stable door after the horse has been stolen is as perilous as it is specious.'

Worse and worse the further we look into it. Think it over.

In the issue of August 16, 1919, page 259, under an article entitled 'The prime minister's chance,' appears the following: "At the end of last week Mr. Chamberlain told the house that if we continue to spend as we are now spending, we shall be on the road to national bankruptcy, but seemed to regard his statement as a matter of purely academic interest, not requiring any action on his part. He is apparently prepared, after giving this warning, to let things go on as they are. He also stated that on both sides of the account his budget estimates will be very wide of the mark. The expected expenditure will certainly be exceeded, and he will be some £70,000,000 short in his revenue. * * * Perhaps even more astonishing, as an indication of the Government's incapacity to see what is required of it by the country, was its defense of the charges made in the report, already referred to, by the select committee on national expenditure. A very important point, on which great emphasis has been laid by the daily press, was a reply made by the lord advocate (Mr. Clyde) to Sir John Hunter when he urged that criminal proceedings should be taken with regard to certain sums that appeared to have been wrongfully expended. * * * Such is the series of ineptitudes with which the rank and file of what is called our Government have heaped discredit on discredit. * * * We need drastic official economy and taxation. * * * We must pay our way, and since the budget is already a fallacious mockery, it must be amended so as to bring us at least as near to paying our way as we were said to be when it was brought in.'

In the issue of August 23, 1919, page 320, under an article entitled "Controlling the departments," written by Charles John Wilson, appears the following: "Upon all hands we hear cries that if the nation would avoid bankruptcy, greater vigilance must be shown and greater control exercised over the spending departments. * * * Parliament finds it very easy to vote money—that is, to sanction expenditure—but in the present state of our finances it is necessary that much greater control should be instituted. That is wherein all Government departments fail so lamentably when brought into comparison with private enterprise. Why should it be so? Is it not that there is a fundamental difference in the methods employed? * * * Can nothing more be done to show our efficiency as a nation in controlling our spending?"

Mind you, all under a budget policy. Does that sound like economy?

I next compared the bill with the German budget policy. After making a comparison I need not say that I was not only surprised but astounded to see that the German budget system more closely guards its public treasury than the one suggested here. Aside from that, the two are practically the same. First, the preparation of the German budget estimates began with the local authorities. They were then submitted to the provincial authorities who criticized, revised, and coordinated them. They were next forwarded to the appropriate ministry—there are 12 of them. There they were again scrutinized, revised, and classified, and made an integral part of the department estimates. After the estimates were revised by the heads of the respective ministries they were transmitted to the imperial ministry of the treasury for further scrutiny and revision. They were then presented to the imperial chancellor for his approval. The final preparatory step in the budget procedure was the submission of the completed estimates to the Emperor. You will note that the estimates started with the local communities, the States and cities, and step by step were closely scrutinized and reviewed as they passed up to the Emperor, after which they were finally submitted to the Bundesrath showing in itemized form the estimates, receipts, and expenditures.

That procedure has been characterized as autocratic. Here in America, under a democratic form of government, not only where we preach it but where we live up to it, where we have gone to the extent of sacrificing 75,000 lives and expending $50,000,000,000 in order to stamp out autocracy and to make the world a safer and better place in which to live, now, within 12 months after the victory achieved, it is suggested that we plunge headlong into the most autocratic form of government ever suggested; that is, so far as making expenditures are concerned.

As was stated recently at the industrial conference by that noble champion of labor, Mr. Gompers, "Are we in this year of grace, 1919, when we have driven political autocracy off the face of the earth, to submit to an industrial autocrat?" The words can well be applied in this case. As everybody knows, a budget system means lump-sum appropriations, which makes it easier for certain ones to get their hands into the Public Treasury. The centralization of power to appropriate the public money in one committee is undemocratic and a step toward autocracy. It deprives the membership of this House of their rights and prerogatives and their rights can not be invaded without encroaching upon the rights of those whom they represent.

In Germany, after passing through the various steps indicated, estimates were introduced first in the Bundesrath—the chief legislative organ of the Empire—a legislative council of instructed delegates from the several German States, appointed by the Princes or Kings of the States and the senate of the free cities, which council exercised the mixed function of a legislative and executive council or a court of appeals. It possessed the power of initiative and no change of amendment by the Reichstag could become valid without its approval. It was presided over by the imperial chancellor, at the head of the Prussian delegation. The Prussian members numbered 17. The total number of the Bundesrath, I believe, was 61. In Germany they had a committee representing the various States, cities, and local communities who watched over the items relating to their own States and saw to it that their rights were fully protected. Upon approval of the budget estimates the imperial chancellor of that body introduced them into the Reichstag with the budget bill, where it was debated and given consideration and then referred to the budget committee, a committee composed of representatives of various political parties, and similar to the one suggested here in this bill. Estimates were examined in detail. The commission from the Bundesrath appeared before the committee to give explanation and information. After that it was reported by the budget committee. Then the estimates were taken up for a second reading and debate. At the third reading the estimates were discussed item by item and then voted upon. As a rule, the majority of the Reichstag approved the budget upon the recommendation of the budget committee. The greatest freedom of debate was always allowed. Complaints against the departments' management were aired and criticized. After approval by the Reichstag the budget was then returned to the Bundesrath where it was finally approved and then promulgated by the Emperor.

Thus you have briefly a comparison of the German policy with the one suggested here. Slack and imperfect it may be, but who will dispute the fact that the German system is more safeguarded? If autocracy was a bad thing in Germany, why not here in America?

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. May I have more time?

Mr. GOOD. I will give the gentleman more time if he wants it.

Mr. HAUGEN. As to the accounting, the proposed bill simply abolishes the office of six auditors and sets up a new bureau, that of the accounting department. The bill provides that the incumbents of the offices of auditors shall be transferred, at their present salaries, to the accounting department. That, of course, neither adds nor detracts. It is on a par with transferring the estimators from the Secretary of the Treasury to the bureau of budgets. All would be under the same influence, and the whole matter can, as before stated, be readily disposed of under the definition of "camouflage." In other words, it would comply more closely to the German system, except that the German system required a monthly accounting made by the imperial accounting department. Its members were nominated by the Bundesrath and approved by the Emperor. Under this bill they will be appointed by the President. Aside from that the two systems are practically the same.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am interested to know whether or not the condition of the Kaiser at the present time is due to the budget system?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have pointed out the budget policy of England, and also the one of the Kaiser. We are now discussing the budget system and expenditures. My only purpose was to point out the disastrous result in all places where it has been tried out and the defects of the one proposed here. We have been experimenting with autocracy and one-man rule. As a result, not only has the Treasury suffered, but the parasites and profiteers have preyed upon the people. As a result, the Steel Trust increased its profits 1,000 per cent. The packers, millers, and others followed suit. The price paid to the farmer was and is being held down, and the price paid by the consumer has been persistently and constantly going up. The favored few are the only ones to benefit.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. WASON. Does the gentleman think that the budget system as practiced by the Kaiser in Germany had anything to do with the Germans' ability to finance such a war as they did?

Mr. HAUGEN. We know that they nearly went bankrupt.

Mr. WASON. Did the country go bankrupt? How long were they able to stand out alone and finance the conflict?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have no comment to offer on that phase. I did not rise to discuss that proposition. I came here to discuss the budget systems and to compare the one suggested here with other systems.

Mr. WASON. I will put my inquiry in other language. Is it not a fact that when Germany had the budget system, which the Kaiser had some control over and safely guarded, that made it possible to put them in a condition to wage this war?

Mr. HAUGEN. I know that autocracy in Germany was criticized and condemned. I also know that the American dollar has shrunk in half, and that, according to recent quotations, the rate of exchange in Germany has depreciated about 75 per cent. If the value of the American dollar has depreciated 50 per cent and if German paper money is worth only 75 per cent of the American dollar, the Kaiser's dollar is worth only 12½ cents. If the budget policy had anything to do with credit, it goes without saying that it was a failure.

As everybody knows, a budget system means lump-sum appropriations, as was pointed out in the report and as was evidenced by previous reports of the committee. You have had your lump-sum appropriations. You have had your estimates. You have had your experience, like the rest of us. Only a short time ago you cut an appropriation of $6,000,000 to $4,000,000, and then you got up to $14,000,000, and landed at $8,000,000, all on a single item. Lump-sum appropriations were recently made. As a result we have the Arlington site, the Jamestown Exposition site, a report of the expenditures in Paris and I might refer to the $100,000,000 lump-sum appropriation for the purchase of food. Are you satisfied with the results? If so, the plan suggested will undoubtedly bring about like results.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota). The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is making such an appealing speech that I was wondering whether he would like to have some one here to hear him. We have about 25 men on the floor. If the gentleman would like to have an audience, I will make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HAUGEN. It will all appear in the RECORD. If anybody cares to read it, he will have an opportunity to read it from the RECORD. I shall be satisfied.

I will take only another minute.

Gentlemen, the results obtained under the budget policy in other countries do not square with the contention set forth in the report. The bill now under consideration, if enacted into law, may do no harm. I doubt that it will improve matters. As this bill affects expenditures only, if it bankrupts our country as it has other countries, that may in time be overcome. But when a resolution having for its object an encroachment on the rights and privileges of the Members of the House is to be taken into consideration, that is a different matter. I for one shall oppose it. Recently our policy has been not to make this House more autocratic, but to make it more representative. Experience with autocratic power in the past has resulted in wreck and ruin. Shall it be tried again? Experience, careful thought, and consideration convince me that the best interests of the people in general and of the country at large would be better served by increasing the number of appropriation committees. In my opinion we should have at least one appropriation committee for each department.

Besides that, I am absolutely opposed to the concentration of legislative power in one man or in one committee, thus curtailing the Member's rights and personal independence. And, as I have stated, the Member's rights can not be encroached upon without invading the rights of those whom he represents. I believe that the people of the United States should have full opportunity to have their desires recorded; that their Representatives may have an opportunity to record their votes according to the dictates of their consciences and their best judgment.

Why, gentlemen, that is simply contending for that for which our forefathers fought and died. With due regard and respect to those who disagree with me and who believe in the concentration of legislative power, who believe that the best interests of the people can be better served thereby, and with due regard for and full appreciation of the charms and shrewdness of the proponents of the resolution, I can not help but believe that it is safer to trust to the judgment of 435 Members of the House representing 112,000,000 of people than to leave it to any one man or any one committee. We have had experience along this line in the past. It is fresh in the memory of all of us. It resulted in wreck and ruin.

The rights and the principles for which our forefathers fought and died are as sacred to the American people to-day as they ever were. Rest assured that they are not going to yield in that respect. Our march will be onward. It will be upward. We will continue to lead all nations not only in commerce, in agriculture, and in industrial pursuits but in honor, dignity, in morality, and everything that goes to make a nation great and grand. [Applause.]

If I read the handwriting on the wall correctly, no autocracy or legislative subjugation for any length of time will be tolerated. Though the American people have at times submitted to autocratic rule, burdensome taxation, and inconvenience, you can put it down for a certainty that this and coming generations will ever contend for and maintain their rights. Now, as in the past, the American citizen's love for equal rights granted under the Constitution are as near and dear to him as they were to our forefathers who bled and died for them. He can at all times be counted upon to be true and loyal to our grand and glorious Government, with its splendid and magnificent institutions, and you may rest assured that its honor and dignity will ever be maintained.

Patriotism, loyalty, and the principles for which our fathers fought and died are as safe to-day as they ever were. [Applause.] And any party or set of men that undertakes to interfere with them will, as in the past, forever regret it. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. One minute, Mr. Chairman. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Suppose the gentleman's committee, on making and reporting out a bill with this budget system in effect, should recommend the appropriation of a certain sum of money and that bill is passed, and suppose the budget committee should turn the proposition down and refuse to have the appropriation made. Is there any way that the gentleman, as chairman of the Agricultural Committee, could get a vote of the House on that proposition?

Mr. HAUGEN. No way at all.

Mr. BLANTON. No way at all?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is made hog tight.

Mr. BLANTON. You are absolutely cut off and hog tied?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will tell you what would happen. There has been more intense opposition to these few million-dollar appropriations for agriculture, for labor, and for education than to all the other appropriation bills. There is no secret about it. Here is your budget. It calls for, say, $4.000,000,000. The revenue is only three and a half billion dollars. It will be necessary to cut the expenditures, the budget, half a billion dollars. It comes up to your bureau of budget, and what happens? The munition factories or the navy yards are in the favor of the bureau of budget, or whatever it may be. Where is the reduction to be made?

The director of the budget may say, "This little Department of Agriculture does not amount to very much. It asks $40,000,000. Cut it down to $20,000,000. It must get along with $20,000,000. Here is education. Cut education $10,000,000. Here is labor. Cut labor $10,000,000. That will save $40,000,000. That will give a friend a contract for another battleship, or $40,000,000 to improve some river or harbor or to buy more munitions."

Mr. BLANTON. Then I understand that no committee of this House can recommend and pass a bill authorizing an appropriation to be made, after this proposed budget system is adopted? I understand this from the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HAUGEN. Page 3 of the resolution reads:

Rule XXI, add an additional clause as follows:

"5. No bill or joint resolution carrying appropriations shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations, nor shall an amendment proposing an appropriation be in order during the consideration of a bill or joint resolution reported by a committee not having that jurisdiction. A question of order on an appropriation in any such bill, joint resolution, or amendment thereto may be raised at any time."

Mr. BLANTON. No committee can?

Mr. HAUGEN. How could it under that rule?

Mr. BLANTON. I mean with the budget system.

Mr. HAUGEN. I referred to the budget system and amendment to the rule. That is not suggested here. You are speaking of a liberal budget system, but I am speaking of the autocratic budget system proposed here.

Mr. BLANTON. Under this autocratic budget system will it not be possible to bring in bills authorizing appropriations to be made?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not under the rule if amended as suggested, except by the one committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Not with this proposition?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is absolutely hog tight. No one need appear. Nearly all the committees are even cut off from making privileged reports. The Committee on Agriculture and the rest of them are not even permitted to make privileged reports, but the pork barrel is given the privilege under the proposed rule. And, as I said, it is made hog tight. I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes to ask the chairman of the committee a question for information.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I should like to ask the chairman of this special committee and of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. GOOD] whether under this proposed budget system a committee such as the Agricultural Committee will not thereafter still have the right and the power to bring in proposed legislation, merely authorizing appropriations to be made, just as at this time?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly. No power has been taken away from any committee by the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Did the gentleman say yes or no? I did not understand his answer.

Mr. GOOD. I said the resolution did not propose to take away from a single committee of Congress any of its powers to report out legislation.

Mr. HAUGEN. But you take away the privilege to call up at any time.

Mr. BLANTON. Will that committee have the right to report legislation merely authorizing appropriations to be made?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; that is a legislative function.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a legislative function. Then the House has the right to pass on that proposed legislation and vote it up or down?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. And if the House votes it up and passes the proposed legislation, then it will be in order upon any appropriation bill. There being legislation authorizing it, it would be in order for any Member of Congress to offer the legislation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. GOOD. Yes. Of course the Senate would have to pass upon it, and the President would have to sign the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but it would not be out of order.

Mr. GOOD. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Because there would be legislation authorizing such appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the answer that the distinguished chairman of the Agricultural Committee made to me a moment ago, I take it, is incorrect.

Mr. GOOD. I did not hear the answer.

Mr. HAUGEN. I said that it cut off the right of privileged reports and to report appropriation bills.

The committee report reads:

CHANGES PROPOSED IN THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

The resolution makes three important changes in the rules of the House, viz:

(1) It centers in one Committee on Appropriations, composed of 35 Members, the authority to report all appropriations, and takes from the Committee on Agriculture, Committee on Foreign Affairs, Committee on Indian Affairs, Committee on Military Affairs, Committee on Naval Affairs, Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and the Rivers and Harbors Committee the authority now vested in those committees to report appropriations.

(2) It requires that any Senate amendment to a general appropriation bill which would be in violation of clause 2 of rule 21, if said amendment had originated in the House, shall be first submitted to the House for a separate vote before such amendment be agreed to by the managers on the part of the House.

(3) It permits the raising of a point of order at any time on any appropriation item carried in any bill or joint resolution reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations.

It is at once apparent that the principal change proposed in the rules of the House is the one centering all appropriations in a single committee.

Mr. BLANTON. But they still have the right to recommend legislation merely authorizing appropriations to be made—not making appropriations?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Merely authorizing them to be made.

Mr. HAUGEN. The proposed amendment to the rule does not so provide. That has never been the function of my committee. We have been an appropriating committee, with the right to report at any time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I am indeed glad to know that Democrats and Republicans have at last come together in the consideration of a bill to establish a national budget system and an independent audit of Government account.

Conservative Members of Congress have been appealing to the people for a long time to produce more and economize in order to reduce the high cost of living. Not only that we should preach economy to the people, but we should also practice economy in government.

The slipshod manner in which congressional appropriations are now made constitutes in itself ample argument in favor of the adoption of the budget system in this country. We know that under the present system estimates are furnished Congress by the various departments, being transmitted through the Treasury Department, but not being inspected by any authoritative body. It is very plain to anyone who knows anything about legislation that in this way there is duplication of appropriations, waste, and an entire absence of proper business methods. We do not know until the end of the session how much money is voted to run the Government or whether there will be sufficient revenues to meet the appropriations. A private business run upon a similar plan would soon wind up in the bankruptcy courts. Some one said a good many years ago, when the total appropriations of Congress were not more than $1,000,000,000, that a saving of $300,000,000 a year could be effected if modern business methods were adopted in the financial affairs of the Government. No one can attempt, with any degree of accuracy, to name the exact amount of money spent needlessly during any fiscal year. However, one can safely say that the figures will run into millions of dollars.

With a large war debt hanging over us and the many appropriations needed to run the Government, it seems to me that it is high time to change our present system and save this money to the taxpayers of the United States. The Select Committee on the Budget to which this bill was referred reported the bill now under consideration favorably. The committee in its report says that it was their policy to consider the subject in its broadest aspect in order to determine not what was theoretically desirable but rather to determine what was practically feasible, keeping in mind at all times that to it had been committed the problem of recommending a system that would be in complete harmony with our constitutional form of Government. The report also states that there was a uniformity of opinion on the part of all the witnesses who appeared before the committee, and that without exception they all criticized the present system of handling our finances and took the position that we should adopt the budget system.

I think the definition given by one of the witnesses who appeared before the committee meets the situation that now confronts our Government:

A national budget—

He said—

is the instrument through which the several financial operations of the Government are correlated, compared one with the other, and brought under examination at one and the same time. It should be at once a report, an estimate, and a proposal. It is a document through which the Chief Executive, as the authority responsible for the actual conduct of governmental affairs, comes before the fund-raising and fund-granting authority and makes full report regarding the manner in which he and his subordinates have administered affairs during the last completed year; in which he exhibits conditions of the Public Treasury, and, on the basis of such information, sets forth his program of work for the year to come and the manner in which he proposes that such work shall be financed.

That the significance of past operations and the purpose of proposal for the future may be clearly seen, this document must be complete and detailed. It must cover all the financial operations of the Government, and cover them in such a way that the relationship between past actions and proposals for the future revenues and expenditures and assets and liabilities may be clearly seen.

The most important feature of a budget is that it shall be all comprehensive. It must bring together in one consolidated statement all the facts regarding the financial conditions of the Treasury and the revenues and expenditures of the Government, past and prospective.

The budget under the proposed plan will be an Executive budget only to the extent that the Executive initiates the budget. It is a congressional budget, in that it has been considered and acted upon by Congress. It is very evident that under the proposed plan the responsibilities of the President and the responsibilities of Congress will be well defined, and each branch will be held to a strict accountability for the part it has acted. Then, too, under the proposed plan the accounting department will furnish information to Congress and to its committees regarding the expenditures of the Government.

It may be that defects will be discovered in this bill while it is under consideration. If such is the case, let us hope that we will work in harmony to correct them. There is unanimity in Congress as to the necessity for economy and retrenchment. The only way we can practice real economy is to have business-like administration in every department of the Government, and that will come only when we adopt a budget system. If care is exercised and waste abolished, taxes, of course, can be reduced. If Congress will adopt a budget system, it will accomplish a great benefit for the people. Even the United States, with a total estimated wealth of more than $200,000,000,000, is not so rich or so powerful that it can afford to disregard the principles of business efficiency or fail to provide itself with a carefully-mapped-out budgetary plan. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana yields back two minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, Mr. HAUGEN, discuss what he terms his opposition to this measure. I regret to say that he raised only three points—one, that of the lump-sum appropriation, which would be eradicated by the passage of this bill; second, the question as to whether other committees could bring in bills authorizing certain appropriations, the answer is that they can; third, as to how the budget system would be controlled. It would be controlled in two ways—one by the director of the budget in the office of the President, who would provide the budget, the other by the comptroller system, which would be under the jurisdiction and supervision of Congress itself.

The passage of this bill means the greatest forward step this country has taken in government in over 50 years. It is one of the greatest steps that we could possibly take, because it will mean in the long run that the American people will get 100 cents worth of return for every dollar appropriated by them.

The expenditures of the Federal Government have increased from $581,393,374 for the year 1880 to $21,813,356,598 for the year 1918. With such a large amount to be spent as twenty-one billions for the past year and with the knowledge that each succeeding year would mean an expenditure of at least $5,000,000,000, the time has arrived when the people as well as their representatives must give very thorough study to the question of taxation as well as expenditures.

Once we know each year the amount which our revenues will produce, we can by proper scrutiny and the elimination of unnecessary bureaus and their duplication keep our expenditures within the amounts which the Treasury is to receive.

It has been repeatedly pointed out in the newspapers that we have entirely too much duplication of the same kind of work.

Recently I was asked to obtain some publications for the bringing up of a young infant. Investigation showed that the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor, the Division of Publications in the Department of Agriculture, and the Public Health Service, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, all published pamphlets covering the same subject. We have doctors in the Interior Department, in the Labor Department, in the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and several other departments, when if all these doctors were under one chief or one bureau head there would be eliminated the useless overhead charges, including space occupied, besides the amount spent for unnecessary clerical and stenographical work.

We can realize very fully that the constant expenditure of money by the Government without the full realization of the fact that the amount being expended is greater than the income must result in a still heavier burden of taxation to be placed upon the people.

Dr. Edward A. Fitzpatrick, now of Wisconsin but a native New Yorker, who has written the book entitled "Budget Making in a Democracy," has repeatedly pointed out that it is not merely the amount of expenditure, but how the money is spent, which is of the deepest interest to the people at large.

It seems to me that, in order that the budget may be made more effective, that the rules of the House must be changed, in order that the members of the Cabinet should be permitted to appear upon the floor of the House when appropriation bills involving their departments are up for consideration, and in order that Members of the House may have the opportunity of personally interrogating them as to the items contained therein. It is not as radical a change as some people imagine.

We are passing through trying times in this country, and in order that there may be a reduction in the cost of living it becomes every American to try to set his own house in order and to purchase only where he can obtain the most for his money. He should have a budget of his own for his home. He should strictly adhere to that budget. The Government of the United States should not only have a budget, but there should be constant and close scrutiny for the purpose of making certain that the Government obtains full value for every dollar spent.

The American people are giving deep study at the present time to the various questions which are constantly arising, and they view with the greatest of favor the enactment of this bill into law.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will vote for this bill provided the Budget Committee can prove that under this system we can save millions for the taxpayers of our country. The Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress on both sides of the House were elected with the view of exercising economy. I have been opposed to the number of bureaus that have been created in this and other Congresses since I have been a Member, because they take too much money from the Treasury.

It was said by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that our taxes for 1920 would be $6,000,000,000 more than in 1919. It is true that we have saved the country millions of dollars, but it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we are putting in at the bunghole and drawing from the spigot, and if we continue to do this, at the end of the Sixty-sixth Congress the barrel will sound pretty empty. The distinguished chairman of the committee in his eloquent address the other day, when he opposed the vocational bill, asked Congress, Where are we to get the money? There was no answer. He asked the question again, Where will you get the money to meet our national expenses? And I have not, Mr. Chairman, heard a reply. And yet within 24 hours after his question he brings into this House a bill creating a bureau which, as one of the members of the committee said, will cost the Government $100.000, but he also remarked it would save the country millions of dollars. I want to know how this autocratic committee, which is composed of the same men as the Appropriations Committee, is going to revolutionize the affairs of state so that it may be able to save millions of dollars for the American people. I want to hear from the present chairman of the committee, and I ask him now to answer my inquiry, What is the procedure by which these committees will be able to save the country millions of dollars through this new committee of 35? I again ask the gentleman the question.

Mr. GOOD. If the entire power was centered in one committee that committee could look at the entire picture at the beginning of the Congress, and if cuts had to be made these cuts could be distributed throughout the various services of the Government, and it would not leave upon one committee the obligation to make all the cuts that were required, while perhaps some other committee might appropriate extravagantly. One yardstick would apply to all committees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. What greater facilities would your committee have in obtaining necessary appropriations under the budget system than other committees if, as you say, you are going to save money?

Mr. GOOD. This bill will provide for greatly added facilities for furnishing information to the appropriate committees, whether we have one committee or many.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman give us an instance?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; first, the items will come in thoroughly digested, and it will not be the estimate of the bureau chief alone. It will be the estimates of the President of the United States, who will know that if they are too large they are going to be criticized. It will also be scanned by the accounting department, and the comptroller will be able to have his force of auditors at all times at the command of Congress, so that if any inefficiency or waste exists he will convey the information to Congress.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Would not the present appropriation committees have the same facilities?

Mr. GOOD. I do not think so.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. They could call the same witnesses.

Mr. GOOD. The President of the United States never comes before the committee. Members of the Cabinet used to come, but they have quit coming because they demonstrated the fact that they do not know anything about the bureaus under them.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I want to say that I am in favor of any system which is going to lessen the taxes for people of the country.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there are two kinds of committees existing in the House to-day, one which has appropriating power and the other that has the power only to authorize appropriations with respect to legislation proposed. From the answer by the chairman of the Agricultural Committee [Mr. HAUGEN] to the question I propounded to him, and the answer given by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. GOOD] to the same question, evidently they do not coincide. I do not yet understand the situation. I would like for the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, if he will, to explain. I would like to understand the situation, and I believe other Members would also. I would like to have him explain clearly to the House whether, if the proposed budget plan is adopted, the various committees of the House would still have the right to bring in and report proposed legislation that authorizes appropriations.

Mr. GOOD. Yes. Authorization is legislation, and we have not curtailed their power of legislation in the least.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel quite as much at home here as in a Texas courthouse, and I am going to ask that you permit me to stand here and that you do not interrupt me. I probably will not be able to say anything worth hearing, but I shall have a better chance to do it if you do not interrupt me.

The subject under consideration by the House is one which is very interesting to the country. It is interesting to the new Member, who realizes something of the present situation in the country, and the need of some kind of a satisfactory solution of the difficulty which confronts us. It is confessedly great. I would not feel inclined to support any measure that deprived Congress of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, because, in the first place, I realize the binding force of that instrument, and, in the next place, I think the power in safer hands here than elsewhere. While I think the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], to the effect that there might be some house cleaning here, are pertinent and true, yet I believe, from what I have seen at a distance as a citizen, from what I have seen since I have been a Member, that if this body is not the protecting and economizing influence in the National Government, then its guardian forces are weak. I believe that the House of Representatives is the people's best hope.

I am inclined to favor the measure under consideration, because, as presented here, it seems that it will furnish more information to us, to the country, to those who would act upon the various estimates, and enable us all, including our fellow citizens at home, to form a more intelligent judgment, because based upon more accurate information, more careful examination. I favor it because I think it will tend to make public the issues involved. I believe it will draw public attention to the estimates and appropriations as we will consider them. I think it will, therefore, be helpful.

But permit me to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that I think that no mere system by itself will accomplish what we want. Machinery without motive power will be ineffectual. Any new organization that has not behind it a new attitude on the part of Congress and on the part of the people whom we serve here will not accomplish all that should be accomplished. It is a very common mistake for men who want to forward a given cause or to work a given reform to build on more and more machinery, to add new systems.

My position is that whatever the system be, if the Members of this House and the Members of the body at the other end of the Capitol and the determination of the people at home are such as to require it, with any sort of a system, certainly with the one which we now have, we will accomplish the purpose which the people are in earnest about having us accomplish. If our attitude and that of the people at home remain unchanged this system or some kindred system may be helpful, but it will not go very far, because it will limp and stop for lack of life.

I do not intend, in the brief time that I have, to discuss the machinery that is proposed. I think the members of the committee, the men having the benefit of years of experience and study here, are in much better position to advise their colleagues about these various provisions, and I approach it from a somewhat different standpoint, and that is the purpose behind it.

We have had a great deal of talk here about the high cost of living, great Government expenditures, and high taxes. I think it is not an accident that all this talk comes together. I think the subjects are very closely related to each other. While we have nearly reached the conclusion that not all of the evils of the high cost of living can be remedied by legislation, we will make a serious mistake if we conclude that Congress can do nothing. The enormous waste which has been committed by the world and the enormous expenditures which have been made by the Government have been drawn from the substance of the people. The world has wasted enough to provide for its maintenance for several years, and it now seems surprised that the consequences of that waste are upon its people.

For our proper use and for the use of our allies we expended something like $30,000,000,000 during the last two or three years. That means something like $300 per capita—$300 for each man, woman, and child in the United States—or something like $1,500 for each average family of five. We are raising four billions of dollars by taxation in one year. On an average that is about $40 per head, or $200 for an average family of five. Rich people will not feel that drain. Poor people can not pay it. But the average man feels it and is distressed by it. I believe that Congress will make a very serious mistake if it concludes that because we can not right all these evils now it can do nothing. There are two things to be done. One is to make more and the other for the waste to be less. Those things are fundamentally necessary. There is a part of this that we can control. When we draw $4,000,000,000 from the substance of the producers of America in one year we add it to the burdens of their life, we add it to the expense of living.

When we deal with large appropriations we must not imagine that our action has no direct relation, no direct connection, with the problem that the average citizen is trying to solve when he undertakes to make his income meet his expenses. It does have a direct connection with this serious problem with which the average man is wrestling. I am very much gratified to see the working members of this body are trying to solve the great question now.

If you will permit the suggestion from one who is inexperienced in such matters, it is more important than many of us have realized that this problem be worked out. There is not a great deal of starvation nor actual suffering in the United States on account of the high cost of living, but there is a nervousness, there is, if I may call it such, a kind of hysteria, there is a fretfulness, a discontent, in the minds of the people which is not wholesome. When we remember that the doctrines of anarchy and revolutionary socialism are being widely and persistently taught, and that a state of discontent in the minds of the people is the most fertile soil in which that kind of doctrine can take root and grow, we ought then to realize that as great men in other times here have met great problems and have dealt with them heroically and unselfishly and successfully, so we are called upon in the day of America's greatness, of the height of her greatness, to deal with problems perhaps as great as any they dealt with. In my humble judgment we are dealing with them now. I insist that the difficulty of this is greater than many of us realize.

It is not easy for a man who forms extravagant habits to shake them off so long as he has recourse to wealth that he can waste. It is not easy for States and nations having built up a system of enormous expenditures to lessen those expenditures. It is said that taxes once up never go down. The tendencies are the other way. The habit of extravagance and the liberal use of money once contracted is hard to break. This is true of nations. It is especially true of us when we survey the vast field of our wealth and see the magnitude of it. It is especially hard for us to look upon that wealth and upon the resources of the Nation as sufficiently limited to restrain us. It is nevertheless true that there are limits beyond which it is dangerous for us to go.

Another thing in connection with the situation is the attitude of the people whom we represent—their demands for appropriations do not stop. What colleague of mine has been notified by organizations or institutions receiving Government appropriations at home that they want their appropriations decreased because the Government is up against an emergency? What people at home have written us that just now they do not think it would be a patriotic thing for us to take home to our districts all the money we can? The truth is that the people still appear to have the idea that the National Treasury is a kind of self-filling chamber of gold; that it pours in there from unseen sources and flows out and may flow out forever in an almost boundless stream. I think it is our duty to help remove that idea. I am afraid they do not fully realize that the Nation gets its wealth by drawing it from them and that they are pinched and stinted because that wealth is being drawn away from them. In my imperfect conception of my obligation as a faithful Member of this body, representative of my people at home, I shall undertake to inculcate in them, so long as by their partiality I represent them here and as a citizen when I go back among them, the fact that this Government, great as it is and boundless as is the wealth it controls by virtue of its power to take what the people have—that they and their representatives are guilty of vicious, impoverishing, and hurtful waste in expending vast sums of money as they are often expended.

Mr. BLANTON. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. BOX. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell my colleague what I believe our constituents think about the matter. I think that every time we make a lavish and unnecessary appropriation for any part of the country that is in the nature of pork-barrel graft even the good people directly benefited thereby deem our little offering ridiculous, laugh at us in their sleeves, and they look upon us with distrust and compassion, if the term may be used, regretting that we should have such a wrong conception of their ideals and characteristics. We spend hundreds of thousands for garden seed, which the people know was paid for with their money, and is no present from us. If we could only realize how much fun they make of us concerning these items, we would stop the waste. They would like to be able to rely upon us to exercise good judgment in the way in which we should exercise it, in taking care of and conserving the money that belongs to the people of this Government. I do not think that the people in any district in the United States appreciate pork-barrel legislation.

Mr. BOX. I thank my colleague for his suggestion. I yield to no man in admiration and in respect for the good people who have gratified an ambition I have indulged in since I was a child; but will this House and my colleague permit me to say I think they are much more disgusted when the money goes somewhere else than when it comes to them? [Laughter and applause.]

If I am trying to get a part of the pork barrel, I can not stand there with a club and knock every other colleague off when he wants some of it, for he will likewise knock me back. I am saying this because I think it should be said. I am sure my people will not misunderstand me if they see these words, for I have undertaken in whatever career I have here to take my people into my confidence. I am going to deal with them on that basis. In the brief experience that I have had with them on that basis I have not found it unsuccessful. Each one of us owes that obligation to this Nation and to his people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BOX. In addition to that, gentlemen, we need what the honored gentleman from Illinois said we needed here the other day—we need courage in dealing with this situation. These measures that come here demanding more and more money must be discouraged. The money in the Treasury must be dealt with by us as trustees. We are guardians of what there is over there. When I have been here longer, if I am permitted to stay longer, I may be able to work out such a problem as was presented here the other day when the gentleman from Iowa said, "You have not got the money." The faithful, hardworking chairman of the Appropriations Committee said, "You have not the money and you are not going to have the money. What are you voting away? Where are you going to get what you are voting away?"

And then the House proceeded as if that difficulty had not been presented. I am wondering when the budget system is adopted here, and some one we have no less confidence in than we have in our faithful, hard-worked colleague says the same thing, and we know it is true, as we knew it was true when he said it, just how we will deal with identically the same proposition when it is presented under a budget system.

I look among the bills that I understand are to be considered, and I see some providing for a very large outlay; some that will be very hard for the average Member of Congress to resist. When you say to me, for instance, that "You are going to get for Texas several millions of dollars out of the provisions of the Smith-Towner bill," and you ask me how the folks will think of it, if I do not help them to get their part of it. Will they say, "Oh, well, the others are getting a part of it for their districts"? The people should know the heart of these questions, but they often do not. I am wondering how we are going to deal with questions like that when they confront us. I say that is not in criticism of any particular measure, but that situation requires a high order of courage for a set of men who want to serve and please their people, and yet know that they have in their keeping the destinies of this great country.

Mr. MADDEN. I would say that the duty that is imposed upon the Members of Congress then is to look at the Nation and not at the locality.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman is preeminently correct, according to my conception. And will you permit me just a minute to say that I have not forgotten what I said to them when I came up here? I got out on the hill the other day and looked to the West, and there were the hills of Virginia, and my imagination went across the whole continent, to the Pacific Ocean, and up North and down South, and fastened on what the 100,000,000 of American men and women were thinking and doing. Their problems became still more a reality to me. They are human, but they are a great people, entitled to great service from us. Let us not imagine that in any of our little games we are fooling them. From the eyes of that multitude of 100,000,000 Americans there are many discerning and inquisitorial and somewhat doubtful and cynical looks. Ride in a sleeping car, ride in a day coach, go out among the farmers at their schoolhouse meetings, talk with the men in the cab of the engine and in the shops, talk with all of them, and think of them all as one great mass, and remember that they are enormously, tremendously, acutely interested in what we are doing. They know, if we do not know it, that the situation up here is somewhat serious, and when we play politics back and forth across this middle aisle they know it.

Mr. BLANTON. And they know it when the Republican bull whip is flourished over there, too.

Mr. BOX. Well, I wanted to discuss this question, in my unsatisfactory way, with the utmost frankness, and I did not care to put forth any partisan question, because I know we do agree about some of the fundamentals here, and that we should get down to the accomplishment of our purpose.

I will relate a little incident illustrative of that point. The first day I came here I made it a point to meet the honored gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], of whom I had heard since I was a boy. He was in Congress when I was born, or soon afterwards. None of my colleagues who knew me were present to present me, and I introduced myself. Pardon this personal reference. The old gentleman said, "You belong to one party and I to another; we live in different sections of the country and will disagree about many things, but I hope we will agree that we do not want this country to go Bolshevik."

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there are many things that are within our power. We could do them by the exercise of the right purpose and determination. I do not want, if I seem cynical and critical, to be so understood. I do not know how to discuss anything but by just saying what I think about it. But there are some things that I see here that my honest judgment does not approve and which I know our people would not approve. You will permit me to say that although I have not had the experience of years of service here I come as fresh from the body of the people as any of you. I suspect I might be able to form something like as accurate an opinion of what they are thinking and feeling as men who have been here for many years.

My own judgment is that they feel these problems just as acutely as we do, and perhaps more so. I am in full sympathy with what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] said a while ago, when he stated that we ought to begin housecleaning here at home. If my colleagues permit, I will suggest some things that I see.

In the first place, I think every man who has reported here on the conditions in the departments has said that the departments have a great many people that they do not need to whom they are paying high salaries. I think everybody I have heard talk has said that.

Perhaps the limitations of a life of more or less severe poverty has narrowed my views on such subjects, and I would not have them affect my ideas on the problems of my great country. I see things about the Capitol Building, that we control, that do not seem to me to be in the interest of economy. I think, for example, this habit we have of paying the families of our colleagues a year's pay when they die is not justified by law. All respect to the princely men who have sat here, and their families, with whom we sympathize; but where is our justification for that? The Constitution says we shall receive such pay as has been ascertained by law.

The other day a question arose here as to an appropriation, and somebody said, "This is not warranted; this is unwise; we had better have this question carefully looked into"; and an eloquent gentleman rose and said, "Who is kicking about that $7,500 that is paid to the families of deceased Congressmen without warrant of law? If we do things like that, why be particular in dealing with an appropriation like this one?"

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time is extended five minutes.

Mr. BOX. I wonder what could not be justified if you use that as a precedent.

I noticed an incident when I visited this House and had permission to occupy this floor some months ago, when two gentlemen were contesting a seat here. One of them had served for two years; and on the last day of the session, the dying day of the Congress, that contest was decided, and he was unseated, and both of them drew full pay for two years. I wonder what we would say about some such policy as that in one of the departments?

I understand, gentlemen, that this Congress can not right all these evils, and that we can not provide a remedy now that would bind all our successors; but I do say that our committees on elections could hasten these contests, whatever may be the merits of them, and whatever is to be the action ought to be taken. [Applause.]

I say these things, gentlemen, not because I think that anything that we may say on such abuses in this House will have such a wonderful effect on the financial condition of the country; but they do have a big effect on the estimate which the people place upon us and upon our action. Such things do have a wonderful effect upon the way the other man looks at us while we talk economy. I have been indulged very much in the time extended to me. My judgment is, gentlemen, that the problem of reducing expenses and taxes is serious.

We are going to have to deal with very difficult questions. Dr. Franklin said during the last hours of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 that almost everything depends upon the opinion which the people hold of their Government.

My own study of history has taught me that the people have been devoted to their government so long as they could respect it. I have never yet read of an instance where a fairly good government, once established, was overthrown by its people. We will have nothing to fear upon the part of this liberty-loving, discerning, independent people that we represent here if we in the utmost good faith undertake to live up to our preachments of economy [applause]; and, after building a better system, let us put behind it the motive power that will carry it into successful execution. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas yields back one minute of unused time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is marketing evening. I think we ought to have a chance to market this evening. I am going to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. GOOD. I hope the gentleman will not do that. I am going to move to rise presently.

Mr. BLANTON. There are a good many employees of this House who have to do their marketing Saturday evening, and many places close a little after 5 o'clock. With the usual extensions, and so on, we will have to be here until after 5.30. So I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. MONDAY, October 20, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our lives are in Thy hands. Thou dost order our ways. The truth that Thou hast given to us stands ever past recall, and our highest good comes from bringing our thought and our will into subjection to Thy thought and Thy will. To live out our lives as God would lead us is to reach the highest good. We pray Thy blessing upon us this day that we may think of Thee who art the God above us, leading us to the accomplishment of a divine purpose. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a petition of 14,450 clergymen, pastors of churches and representatives of leading denominations and Christian agencies, praying for the speedy ratification of the treaty of peace without reservations or such amendments as would require a resubmission of the treaty to the peace conference and to Germany. The letter of transmittal and the body of the petition will be printed in the RECORD, and the petition will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The letter and petition are as follows:

NATIONAL COMMITTEE ON THE CHURCHES AND THE MORAL AIMS OF THE WAR,
New York, October 16, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS RILEY MARSHALL,
The Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing herewith a petition signed by 14,450 clergymen, pastors of churches and representatives of the leading denominations and Christian agencies of America, asking for the ratification at the earliest possible date of the Paris peace treaty, embodying the league of nations covenant, without reservations or such amendments as would require the resubmission of the treaty to the peace conference and Germany.

Will you kindly see that this is brought to the attention of Congress.

Very respectfully, yours,

HENRY A. ATKINSON.

We, the undersigned clergymen, representing the churches of the United States, urge the Senate of the United States to ratify at the earliest possible date the Paris peace treaty embodying the league of nations covenant without reservations or such amendments as would require resubmission of the treaty to the peace conference and Germany.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have a telegram here from the Nevada Federation of Women's Clubs, which I should like to have read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

ELKO, NEV., October 18, 1919.

Senator KEY PITTMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Believing that peace should be attained at the earliest moment, the Nevada Federation of Women's Clubs, in convention assembled, do earnestly urge the United States Senate to ratify without amendment the treaty of peace, including the league of nations. Mailing resolutions adopted.

Mrs. E. K. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Resolutions.
Mrs. GEORGE WEST, Director.

Mr. LODGE. I present a letter, in the nature of a protest, from the director of the Irish National Bureau, of Washington, D. C., which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IRISH NATIONAL BUREAU,
Washington, D. C., October 20, 1919.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: The resolution offered Friday, October 17, by Senator WALSH of Montana, wherein is sought an expression of opinion by the Senate that following ratification of the league of nations covenant and the peace treaty "the state of affairs in Ireland and the right of its people to self-government be presented by the United States to the council or assembly of the league," should be understood by the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senate as in no sense sanctioned by those who, on August 30, appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee and spoke in behalf of the 20,000,000 Americans of Irish blood.

Ireland was denied a hearing at Paris, though the United States Senate, by a vote of 60 to 1, adopted a resolution asking for a hearing. That resolution was stronger than the resolution now offered by the Senator from Montana. It was the voice of the American people speaking in behalf of a small nation bowed down by oppression.

The oppressor had no difficulty by diplomatic wiles in prevailing on the American delegates to ignore the resolution of the United States Senate.

If the league of nations covenant containing the objectionable provisions supported by Senator WALSH of Montana is ratified, Great Britain will have six votes and the United States one. It is ludicrous to expect justice before a court so constituted, and more particularly when the power, the voice, and the vote of the delegate from the United States would be controlled absolutely by the same influences that contemptuously ignored the Senate's prior resolution and denied the hearing then asked.

Offer at this time of a resolution asking for a hearing after the court has been packed and the oppressing nation has the United States entangled into an alliance which compels the United States to abide by the decision of the packed court can not be viewed by those authorized to speak for the 20,000,000 Americans of Irish blood as an act springing from a sincere desire to aid Ireland. Rather must it be viewed as an instance of "drawing the red herring across the trail," and an attempt to divide forces which unitedly are striving to save America as well as Ireland.

All who are vested by the Republic of Ireland with authority to speak for the people of Ireland, and all who have earnestly, during the past few months, also for years, voiced the judgment, views, and declared wishes of Americans asking that Ireland be accorded justice, have time and again protested that article 11, quoted by Senator WALSH of Montana, does not provide the relief he seeks to read from its wording.

The judgment and views of those who rightfully speak for Ireland should be respected by Senator WALSH of Montana. They would prefer that he should share the conclusion of Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, who, of recent date, declared on the floor of the Senate:

"I regret to say that I am convinced that there is no agency created or provision made in the covenant which gives the slightest hope of the league of nations ever amicably adjusting the problems of submerged peoples. I refuse to mislead them by suggesting possible opportunities for hearings or adjustments when no such provisions are contained in the document before us."

The Irish National Bureau being authorized to speak officially for the Friends of Irish Freedom and federated bodies, may I respectfully ask that this communication be read or otherwise presented to the attention of the Senate.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL T. O'CONNELL,
Director Irish National Bureau.

Mr. LODGE. I also present resolutions of the Patrick H. Pearse Branch of the Friends of Irish Freedom, of Washington, D. C., in which they register their opposition to the scheme of the resolution of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and urge the Senate to vote it down. I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Senator THOMAS J. WALSH of Montana, on the 17th day of October, 1919, introduced and had read in the United States Senate a resolution which is hereto annexed and made a part of this resolution; and

Whereas the purpose of the resolution was and is to delude the unwary; to impose upon the true friends of peace; to obscure the real question of freedom for Ireland and other small nations, now the issue between the watchdogs of power and the champions of self-determination for all small nations; to serve partisan politics as against the integrity of the American Republic; to put the mongrel flag of internationalism before the Stars and Stripes, our national emblem; to prefer the rule of might in the place of the rule of right; to disregard the advice of Washington in regard to foreign and entangling alliances; and to throw into the discard the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Monroe doctrine for the rule of force as expressed in the league of nations; and

Whereas in this, the age of commercialism and shams, the United States is not without champions for the perpetuation of our institutions, which were born of the Declaration of Independence and saved by the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown and our victory of 1812; and

Whereas in every national crisis there has appeared in the arena those dashing souls who dare to tell the truth and who throw down the gantlet to those advocates of prescriptive rights who are willing to barter our liberties and surrender with the pen what Washington and other patriots obtained with the sword; and

Whereas there are those who are willing to forget the bitter rule of hypocrisy and woe which has obtained in Ireland, Egypt, India, and in our own country in colonial days, and submit to foreign rule under a league of nations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Patrick H. Pearse Branch of the Friends of Irish Freedom, Washington, D. C., registers its opposition to the scheme of Senator WALSH'S resolution, which is a delusion and a snare.

Resolved further, That we will never recognize those encroachments of insolent power upon the rights of our people, which is the very heart and purpose of the covenant and which will rivet the chains of slavery and humiliation upon all small nations, if the idea of the resolution of Senator WALSH is accepted by the people as to recognition of the Irish republic.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, with the request that the Walsh resolution be voted down, because it is without a measure of relief or comfort to those small nations who are struggling for self-determination.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I send to the desk a telegram and ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read it.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., October 3.

Mrs. JOHN A. FINCH,
2340 West First Avenue, Spokane, Wash.:

The League to Enforce Peace—William Howard Taft, president; Lawrence Lowell, chairman—is conducting an active and necessarily expensive campaign to secure an expression of public opinion that will compel ratification of the peace treaty without reservations, that would require resubmission to the Paris conference or a separate treaty with Germany. Will you not help the cause by a substantial contribution?

Herbert S. Houston, treasurer; George W. Wickersham, Vance McCormick, Cleveland H. Dodge, Oscar S. Strauss, finance committee, Bush Terminal Sales Building, New York.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to have read three short telegrams from California, following those I introduced into the RECORD on Saturday last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., October 18, 1919.

Senator G. M. HITCHCOCK,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

To-day mailed 663 signatures on petition to Senator JOHNSON.

Mrs. L. P. BOYCE,
Secretary Women's League for Peace Treaty.
Mrs. RAY LYMAN WILBUR,
President.

PASADENA, CALIF., October 10, 1919.

Senator HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Pasadena Clearing House Association have to-day sent the following telegram to United States Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON:

"The Pasadena Clearing House Association, representing the unanimous sentiment of the banks of this city, respectfully request that you cease your opposition to the ratification of the peace treaty and the league of nations covenant. We believe that the business interests of this section are practically unanimous in their desire for prompt ratification of the peace treaty and the covenant of the league of nations."

L. B. COULSTON.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., October 18, 1919.

Senator HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following telegram has just been sent to Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON:

We beg your change of vote and support of measure."

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Tennessee Bridge Co., a corporation chartered under the laws of the State of Tennessee, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Tennessee River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation near the city of Loudon, Loudon County, Tenn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SHANTUNG PROVISION OF PEACE TREATY.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, an extract from the Manchester Guardian in relation to the Shantung provision of the peace treaty.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Reprint from the New York American of August 29, 1919.]

"GREAT BRITAIN WARNED OF JAPANESE MENACE TO UNITED STATES IN SHANTUNG—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN SAYS AMERICANS FEEL AS ENGLAND WOULD IF TREATY GAVE BELGIUM TO FOE.

"[By Forbes Fairbairn, Universal Service staff correspondent.]

"LONDON, August 28.

"Britain is experiencing a sharp awakening to the danger of secret treaties in which the interests of all the associated Governments are not concerned.

"The Liberal Manchester Guardian to-day solemnly warns the British Government against the Shantung commitment and points in the strongest terms to what it describes as the Japanese menace to the United States. Says the Guardian:

"'The action of the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations for a direct amendment of the peace treaty can not be dismissed as a sentimentality or partisan obstruction.

"'It has two main objects, both of which are worth understanding, even at the risk of speaking too plainly.

"'Primarily, the action arises from a deep and widespread conviction in America that a conflict with Japan impends. Secondly, most Americans regard the present Japanese Government as differing from the old Prussian Government only in this: Japan has not the physical resources for the struggle.

"'AMERICANS HIGHLY APPREHENSIVE.

"'The masses of the American people are extraordinarily sensitive toward anything that seems to aggrandize Japan. Recently they have noted three things, filling them with apprehension.

"'First. The mineral and strategic advantage accruing from the Shantung privileges they regard as similar to the advantages which accrued to Germany from the control of Alsace-Lorraine.

"'Second. China's betrayal they regard as not only vicious in itself, but as highly dangerous, because it alienates a people who in a future war would side with the Occident.

"'Third. Above all, they are profoundly moved by the fact that coincident with America's entry into the war the Allies should have made secret arrangements with Japan affecting so closely the vital interests of America.

"'This latter fact cut to the quick and convinced Americans that a greater peril lies ahead than they had believed.

"'They have no faith whatever in Japanese promises, for they recall the long list about Korea and Manchuria, as well as the infamy of the 21 demands, and when they examine the promise now given and they see it involves the retention of economic privileges, and they know how little anything else matters in the exploitation of a weak country.

"'They (the American masses) do not believe in the power of the League of Nations to correct the evil.

"'They argue that if secret agreements have bound France and Britain to deliver Shantung to Japan, what evidence is there that France and Britain would later accept the risk of forcing Japan to relinquish the booty?

"'MISCHIEF THEN BEYOND REPAIR.

"'If anybody confirms the Japanese title, so Americans reason, Japan will be intrenched behind the "sanctity of treaties," and the mischief will be irreparable.

"'America, they say, can not validate a title intending later to impugn it. Morally and practically, it is better to prevent a wrong than to try to undo it later, they add.

"'It is of the utmost importance that British Liberals be not misled in this matter. Shantung seems far away to them, but to America Shantung is almost as close as Belgium is to England.

"'If British Liberals could imagine that the treaty were delivering Belgium to Britain's most serious potential enemy, they would understand the character of American sentiment.

"'The other phase of the opposition in the American Senate bears upon the fortunes of the league of nations. Here the motives are much more mixed, but it is fair to say that the opposition is exploiting its genuine fight on the Shantung settlement to delay the ratification and defeat the treaty.

"'Shantung is thus both the end and the means. They wish to defeat it because it is intrinsically bad, and use it to defeat other articles whose badness is clear to them but not clear to the rest of America.

"'The main body of Republicans have no objection to sending the treaty back to Paris, disliking it on so many grounds; but they are concerned as politicians in throwing the onus for such action upon the President, and hope that the complex American interests centering around Shantung will furnish their opportunity. It is almost certain that important consequences not now foreseen will flow from their action.'"

PRICE FIXING.

Mr. GORE. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a report of a speech delivered by Mr. Julius H. Barnes at Duluth upon a recent occasion, in which Mr. Barnes has the wisdom to say that price fixing has failed and has always failed and will always fail. I wish to say that the morrow cometh, and I shall take occasion at a later date to try to have that tattooed on the foreheads of some of the ardent champions of that ancient and exploded theory.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRICE FIXING FAILS, DECLARES BARNES—URGES SOLVING TRADE PROBLEMS BY ECONOMICS INSTEAD OF POLITICS.

"DULUTH, MINN., October 19.

"Denunciation of price fixing by law and other undue interference of Government in business was voiced by Julius H. Barnes, of Duluth, chairman of the United States Grain Corporation, in an address delivered at the Duluth Commercial Club last night. Analyzing the present problems of trade and industry, Mr. Barnes urged their solution 'by economics instead of politics.'

"'I appear before you in the position of wheat director of the United States,' Mr. Barnes declared, 'and I have no sympathy with the office.

"'The guarantee on wheat was fixed by law without consultation of either Herbert Hoover or myself, but when the Government places the responsibility of carrying out a war-time measure there is no alternative except to take the post and remain at it until a year after the war has ended.

"'Price fixing by law has always failed and always will fail.

"'The grain corporation was not a price-fixing body. It was the great merchant of the country, a legalized trading monopoly. The same is true of the Food Administration in other commodities. You can fix trade margins, but it must be done with great care that there is sufficient margin left all along the line.'

"Defending the grain corporation, Mr. Barnes said that $5,500,000,000 worth of foodstuffs were handled for the Allies and the United States without a profit and that the $20,000,000 profit shown after two years of war work was made on trade with neutral countries, which were charging the Allies exorbitant rates for the tonnage and should be made to pay an added price on grain."

NEGLECTED GRAVES IN FRANCE.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in the last number of the Literary Digest, the number for October 18, 1919, under the head of "Neglected graves in France," is printed a letter written by Mrs. Edward McClure Peters to the New York Tribune. The letter speaks of the neglect and bad management of cemeteries in France in which United States soldiers are buried. The letter is calculated to create more or less disquiet and anxiety among those who have friends and relations buried in France. Through Col. Charles C. Pierce, of the Graves Registration Service, and chief of that service, I have received some communications relative to this letter, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD. The first is a cablegram from Gen. W. D. Connor, of the Services of Supply in France, the cablegram being sent on receipt of this letter, which had been forwarded to him; also copy of a letter written by the Quartermaster General to one of the young men whose name is mentioned in the letter of Mrs. Peters; also a circular issued by Col. Charles C. Pierce to all the members of the Graves Registration Service and also a letter from Gen. Pershing to Col. Pierce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the communications will be printed in the RECORD.

The communications are as follows:

"Letter received here and promptly acted upon. Practically all large cemeteries in France created during the past summer, one of the driest seasons for many years; as result the cemeteries still have new and unfinished appearance, which will disappear when grass and flowers have chance to grow. Inspections of cemeteries by supervisors are made monthly and caretakers are paid monthly, hence nothing extraordinary in the caretaker at Thiaucourt not having seen anybody for three weeks. He has been replaced by two discharged soldiers as caretakers.

"With regard to incorrect names, many of these, in absence of identification tag, were obtained from identifying letter, and in some instances are incorrect. All data on crosses is being compared with data on individual casualty cards. This is a big task, and involves careful work, which will take several months to complete. There is no discrimination between officers and men. In the concentration of bodies in some cases the bodies of officers were grouped together and the men were similarly grouped.

"Cemetery at Thiaucourt is laid out according to the approved plans for our cemeteries, and our American Expeditionary Forces cemeteries are better looking than French or British cemeteries that I have seen in France. All have white fences around them, paths are graveled, and grass has been sown, or will be as soon as weather conditions warrant. Have received many commendations on the general appearances of our big cemeteries, although, due to newness, they have not the shrubbery and trees usually found in old cemeteries. Cemetery at Cholly has discharged soldier caretaker, and, considering conditions, there are no just grounds for criticisms. Crosses in all cemeteries will have to be straightened from time to time until ground has thoroughly settled.

"Statements that bodies of our dead are treated with tenderness and care are correct. Menil la Tour is not in care of the French, but is one of our own cemeteries.

"In a letter from Mrs. Peters September 14 she states, 'As to personnel of the Grave Registration Service, I have met several, and each has impressed me as being deeply penetrated with the sacredness of the task before him.'

"Our cemeteries are new. The ground has not had time to settle, due to lack of rains. Anybody who desires can criticize their look if they compare them with long-established cemeteries at home, but can not criticize with justice if they consider the length of time they have been established and the conditions under which they were created and are being kept up. Most of our big cemeteries are in the battle areas, where living conditions are almost impossible and where labor is scarce. * * * Col. Kromer and I personally visit these cemeteries as often as possible, and are impressed with the importance of this work."

"As to the foregoing article on 'Forgotten graves' in the New York Tribune, the Quartermaster General made reply to the father of one of the young men, whose name is mentioned in the article, as follows:

"'The Graves Registration Service, through its chief, Col. Pierce, has worked very hard to perfect cemeterial conditions in Europe, and the work of that service has progressed very satisfactorily, when one considers the large number of cemeteries involved and, in fact, when all of them are new. The public clamor in America for the return of our men from France caused the Graves Registration Service to lose almost its entire personnel of 15,000 men and 450 officers, and it was therefore unable to cope with the situation until some method of reorganization and the gathering of adequate personnel could be made effective by the authorities in France. Those measures, we understand, have been vigorously taken up, and a cablegram from Gen. Connor assures us that this work is to be zealously pressed until the work is complete and satisfactory.

"'As to the markers and inscriptions, it should be stated that these are only temporary and provisional. Measures have been instituted for the substitution of some acceptable form of stone marker, and the National Commission of Fine Arts has been asked by this office for advice with regard to design and material. The inscriptions placed on the temporary markers were the best obtainable at the time they were made. As in the case of national cemeteries in the United States, these will have to be corrected in accordance with the more perfect rolls of the Adjutant General's office and made official before they can be inscribed on the permanent markers in each individual case.'"

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
GRAVES REGISTRATION SERVICE,
QUARTERMASTER CORPS,
U. S. S. "KAISERIN AUGUSTE VICTORIA,"
At Sea, July 13, 1919.

Special G. R. S. Circular.

To all members of the G. R. S., regular and attached:

1. Being temporarily recalled to Washington for consultation concerning future phases of our work, the chief of the G. R. S. regards it as a great privilege to be embarked upon the same ship which is returning 13 units of our service, together with the headquarters of the Neufchateau area to their homeland, and he desires to place in your hands an expression, however inadequate it may be, of his pride in your achievements and his gratitude for the cheerfulness with which you have accepted your prolonged service in France, Belgium, Luxemburg, and Germany, as well as the rare devotion to taxing and irksome duty with which you have ministered to the bodies of our fallen comrades and the anguish of their sorrowing kinfolk.

2. Since the armistice there has been greater demand for your service than ever before. Some 40,000 isolated graves or such as were improperly placed during the months of ghastly combat have been removed to safer points of concentration by your hands, and the names of a multitude, previously unknown, have been placed on the crosses of Jewish headboards that will sentinel these sacred shrines until more permanent markers shall be established.

3. God alone knows how deeply you have gone into the very heart of splendid service and how much your heroic efforts will count in coming years for the comfort of your countrymen.

4. Forgive us for holding you so long. We could not let you go while the lads who belonged to us were left sleeping by the roadsides, in lonely shellholes, or in flooded dells.

5. But now, the first big phase of our operations being practically finished, you are going home, in the pride and comfort of a very great work very well done.

6. May the God of battles guide you through the days to come and give you the priceless reward of His great recognition.

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
OFFICE OF THE COMMANDER IN CHIEF,
France, March 28, 1919.

Lieut. Col. CHARLES C. PIERCE, Quartermaster Corps,
Chief Graves Registration Service,
American Expeditionary Forces.

MY DEAR COLONEL: It is a pleasure for me to express my thanks and the thanks of officers and men of the American Expeditionary Forces to you and your personnel for the efficient work of the Graves Registration Service throughout the war.

You arrived in France a lone advance agent of a branch of service which had still to be organized, and which war's exigencies and hazards made imperative. You and your first handful of workers labored unceasingly, overcame obstacles, taxed your brains and hands to the utmost, and finally achieved an organization worthy of the highest praise.

On every battle field where Americans were engaged, and, having made the supreme sacrifice, were laid to their final rest, the results of your service were seen.

Your personnel toiled, often exposed to the same dangers as front-line troops, and performed their duties there diligently, conscientiously, and sympathetically. The liaison they maintained with our allies was admirable.

The consecrated service you rendered to the kinfolk of our soldiers in conveying information and allaying undue anxiety and fears, the part you played in acting as personal representatives for thousands of soldiers' relatives, meets not only with the appreciation of the entire American Expeditionary Forces but the gratitude of the American people.

A work so comprehensive in its scope, yet characterized by a humanitarianism that is indeed laudable, stands forth in bold relief as a labor of duty and sympathy that will be a credit to our country forever.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN J. PERSHING.

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT LANSING.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered by Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, before the regents of the University of the State of New York at their convocation at Albany on October 17. The address is on the subject of democracy, and contains also an urgent plea for the ratification of the treaty, and particularly the establishment of the league of nations.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE POWER OF DEMOCRACY.

[Address by Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States, before the regents of the University of the State of New York at their convocation at Albany on Oct. 17, 1919.]

"There come times in the lives of nations, as in the lives of individuals, when they should pause and look back along the path which they have been following in order that they may go forward with a better knowledge and understanding of that which lies before them. The United States has reached such a time. The experiences of the last few years have affected materially our national life and our international relations. New conceptions of duty and of right have come into being. New manifestations of national power and national character have dispelled former doubt and apprehension as to the future. New ideas have assumed a prominent place in the political thought of the Nation and will affect either for good or evil the economic and social life of the people. It is indeed a time to stop and consider the lessons of the days through which we have passed, to weigh the facts with deliberation, so that we may wisely meet the problems which lie before us as a Nation.

"As the Great War recedes into the past we are beginning to obtain a truer perspective of America's part in the events which mean so much to civilization and to mankind. When one stands on a mountainside and gazes upward he is unable to gain an adequate conception of the height of the mountain. It is only as he looks back at the peak from the distant plain that he comprehends how far it towers above its fellows. So it is with American achievement in this war. During the stress of the days of effort we thought only of the way to accomplish the task. To-day we realize the greatness of the accomplishment and all that it means.

"And first of all we have obtained a truer conception of the American spirit and a better knowledge of American national character than we had before this time of trial. Whatever may have been said of the mercenary motives of our lives in former days, our acts have proven that this Nation is at heart true to the loftiest conceptions of duty and that it only needed the occasion to demonstrate to a skeptical world that a great democracy was ready—aye, eager—to make any sacrifice to protect its principles of political freedom from the destructive forces of military autocracy.

"As we review that period of the war before the United States became a participant and consider the course of action which neutrality imposed upon us, I do not wonder that the allied nations, which, though exerting themselves to the uttermost, could barely maintain themselves against the great military power of Germany, should have considered us a people blinded to the truth by an inordinate fondness for wealth and ease, a people who had lost those high ideals which were the very pillars on which rested our national greatness and prosperity.

"Nor is it strange that there should also have existed among the German people, even after we entered the war, a belief that we did so unwillingly, and that the real reason for our taking that step was because we had loaned so much money to the allied governments that their defeat would mean a tremendous loss to our financial institutions. Not only would our reputation as money worshipers induce such a belief, but the reason would appeal strongly to the German mind as logical and sensible.

"Thank God, America never sank so low as that even in thought! However great had become the power and temptation of wealth in the daily life of this Nation—and we should not deny its ever-growing influence during the years before we entered the war—the soul of America held the flame of patriotism and loyalty to human rights which needed but a manifest danger to liberty to fan it into a consuming fire.

"From that epoch-making day in April, 1917, when the Congress of the United States so gloriously responded to the President's call to arms in defense of human rights and declared to the world that this Republic was in a state of war with the Imperial German Government the zeal and might of a united people proclaimed to friend and foe alike that they had misjudged our national spirit. With a generosity unequaled America gave and gave and gave, until the mind fairly staggers in the vain effort to comprehend the vastness of the sacrifice. Of its men the Nation gave by the millions; of its wealth, by the billions; of its labor and energy and will, beyond any computation. Without murmur or hesitation and with an enthusiasm which has astounded the whole earth, men and women throughout this land answered every appeal of the Government to do or to abstain from doing, provided that they were assured that their compliance would help win the war.

"The universal acceptance of the draft act was a triumph of the loyalty of the whole Nation which was as amazing as it was splendid. The food-rationing without compulsion of law through the voluntary act of individuals was one of the most extraordinary manifestations of patriotic devotion in this extraordinary time. The ever-increasing burden of taxation, the frequent appeals for war loans almost fabulous in amount, and the repeated campaigns for the Red Cross and other humanitarian enterprises were met by the people with a spirit of approval and ready response which for spontaneity has no equal in the annals of any nation. The demands for increased products of the field, the mine, and the factory were met with the same spirit of willingness and unflagging effort. It is a marvelous record of popular support for a national cause.

"It is needless to review the achievements of our armies and navies, the organization and equipment of millions of men, their transportation overseas, and the essential and decisive part which they took in the final victory over the invading hosts of Germany. These are manifestations of the same spirit of devotion and zeal which inspired popular effort in America and bear witness to what Americanism means and is.

"With such a shining record of achievement as a State and as a people we can fearlessly challenge the world to show us a nation which rose so unitedly and so greatly to the support of an ideal. It is the more remarkable when we remember that the American people were not spurred to action by the presence on American soil of hostile armies or the sight of devastated homes; that they had not witnessed the scenes of horror and desolation which stir men's souls to the depths and call them to deeds of vengeance; that their cities and hamlets had not become masses of smoking ruins; and that their dear ones had not been dragged away to slavery or worse by a brutal soldiery. And yet, with none of these personal incentives to take up arms, the United States as a Nation and its citizens as individuals entered the war against the unholy alliance of Central Europe with an iron determination to sacrifice their all, if need be, to vanquish the foe of human liberty.

"What is the explanation of this spontaneous uprising of a whole people, a people numbered by the scores of millions? No doubt the disregard of American lives and rights caused by the desperate character of the struggle affected many, as well it might. No doubt the utter lawlessness of the German leaders and the brutality of the German soldiery awakened a passionate desire to punish a nation which permitted such deeds. No doubt the plots and intrigues of the Imperial Government against this country were factors in arousing the wrath of our people. But all these reasons combined are insufficient to explain the unanimity of the Nation in its demand for war against the Central Powers. It was something deeper and more impelling than these causes of war which was decisive. Almost without warning an impulse to enter the war swept over the country, an impulse arising from the conviction, which had been unconsciously gaining strength for many months, that liberty and democracy throughout the world would be imperiled if the Germans were victorious. It was this great underlying certainty of impending disaster which induced the millions of our people, as a single man, to demand war.

"Unmindful of the cost and inspired by a spirit of devotion to the cause, the American people deliberately entered the conflict with the stern purpose of doing their full share in saving democracy from the destruction which threatened it. We did not make war as avengers of the wrongs we had suffered. We made war as crusaders to wrest from profaning hands the sacred rights of mankind.

"We are a nation of many bloods and many temperaments. We are a conglomerate people. From every quarter of the earth multitudes have flocked to our shores, seeking in America that freedom of thought and action and that possibility to rise which were denied them in the lands of their nativity. Without the ties of kinship and without the common language and mode of life which give to most nations a strong bond of unity, we, as a people, are held together by the great principle of democracy, which is fundamental to our existence as a Republic. Ours is a bond of political faith rather than a bond of common origin. In this we differ from other peoples, who possess a national character built up from the primitive relationship of the family and the tribe, from ancient tradition and the pride of race.

"American nationality and American national character rest upon an idea of public and individual liberty which is the vital element in our national life. For that idea our forefathers struggled, and, triumphing, they founded upon it this Republic. In the earlier period of our history as a Nation those who came to our shores sought to escape from political oppression and a social system founded upon class distinctions. But in recent years the dominant motive of our immigrants has changed. It has been the desire of material benefit rather than to seek personal freedom that those of foreign birth have come to the United States. The reason is manifest. The spirit of liberalism in the past half century had become more and more potent in European countries and made less burdensome the monarchical and class privileges which had been so long the instruments of oppression. The deprivation of political rights and the all-pervading sense of wrong and injustice ceased to be the chief impulses driving men from the lands of their fathers to find new homes in America.

"With this change of motive on the part of the aliens who in later years landed at our ports and mingled with our people there was among thoughtful Americans a justifiable apprehension as to how strong and how impelling was the American idea among the millions of our foreign-born citizens and their children. It was reasonably asked whether those, without American blood and without hatred of the political and social institutions of the land from which they came, would have the same passion for liberty, the same devotion to democracy, the same patriotic fervor, and sacrificial spirit which had been manifested in past generations of Americans.

"This World War has dispelled that doubt forever. Conclusively and emphatically the answer has been given. The experience of the United States in this great crisis of history has proven to the world that a nation, though it be a mixture of races cemented together by a political idea, is as truly a nation as one rooted in common birth and in centuries of land tenure. We may not possess nationality in the physical sense, but we possess nationality in the spiritual sense. We know now that Americans of to-day, whatever may be their blood, their language, their creed, their manners of life, are devoted to the American idea and to American ideals as are those whose ancestors were identified with the early life of this Republic.

"The satisfaction which we as loyal Americans feel in the spiritual fidelity of our people to the underlying principle of our national life is intensified by the knowledge that a democracy, such as the United States, is able, because inspired with the true spirit of patriotism, to meet every emergency, however great. Patriotism, such as we witnessed in this country during the war years of 1917 and 1918, makes a democracy a unit in purpose and effort. Its manifestation has given us a stronger conviction than we had before that in the principle of democracy we have an instrument which can, through uniting the might of a people, overcome international injustice and prevent the commission of those wrongs which have so frequently been the causes of war.

"Democracy as the central principle of national life operates other than by force in preventing international conflicts and in preserving peace among the nations. An enlightened people, who recognize moral obligation, possess a national conscience which responds to sentiments of justice and right. The more complete the individual liberty and the more universal the enlightenment, so much the more sensitive is that conscience, so much the more strictly do the people hold their government to the path of rectitude. It is only through the instrumentality of democratic institutions that the national conscience can give that expression of purpose and attain that control over governmental action which inspire for the nation the respect of its own people and the confidence of foreign peoples.

"Let democracy be honestly and firmly established as the principle upon which the political system of a nation is erected, and a government is bound to develop which is responsive to the collective conscience of the people. With a government of that sort we can deal frankly and without suspicion of hidden motive, because its acts are tempered by the great moral sense which directs the popular will. While this may be considered an overstatement because of the measure of ignorance which prevails among some peoples and because of the common weaknesses of human nature with which only the idealist fails to reckon, I think that in general we may regulate our conduct in international affairs on the assurance that a truly democratic State would not knowingly wage an aggressive or unjust war against another State.

"But there is another reason—and possibly this is even stronger than the one which I have just stated—for asserting that the principle of democracy is the great enemy of war as well as the great guarantor of international peace. If I have drawn true conclusions from history I am correct in saying that the people of every nation entitled to be called 'civilized' desire peace and abhor war; that a people, appreciating the real object, have never entered upon a war of conquest provided their will found true and free expression; and that they do not willfully oppress the weak or act unjustly toward their neighbors. In a word, the conscience of an enlightened people—and I mean by 'people' all the people and not a privileged political class—checks the evil motives of their Government and only fails to direct national conduct aright when their public servants are not subject to the will of all or when they misrepresent the popular desires.

"To insure to the world a continuing state of international peace democracy should be made the standing policy of civilization. I mean real democracy, and not the mere form without the substance. Real democracy, based upon individual political equality and free from class privilege or influence, is the only agency through which expression can be given to the conscience of a nation and to the popular hatred of war. Democratic nations are not aggressive and domineering. They resent and resist aggression by others. They are not influenced by cupidity or improper ambitions. They are just to the powerful and to the powerless. They do not violate their word or permit personal ambitions to divert them from the constant purpose to do that which is right.

"I am firmly convinced that if every nation was a democracy in reality, as is this Republic, universal peace would be an accomplished fact and not a goal toward which the world looks with longing eyes striving to devise methods by which it may be attained.

"Meanwhile we must seek other means of checking the wrongful use of force among nations. Every agency therefore which has for its purpose the prevention of international wars and the preservation of international peace deserves the earnest and generous support of all men whose horizon is not limited by selfishness or ignorance. The American people, with their abhorrence of war, should be the last to reject any instrumentality which gives promise of preserving amity between nations and of hindering, if it does not actually prevent, an appeal to force. Political antipathies and partisanship ought not to influence the consideration of a great plan of international organization to support a state of peace. Objections have been made to the covenant of the league of nations which is incorporated in the peace treaty with Germany. It is not to be wondered at, considering the complexity of the subject. In fact I do not believe such a document could ever be so perfectly drafted that it would win unanimous approval. But none of the objections, over which so much oratory has been spilt, bulks large compared with the will and purpose of the nations expressed in the covenant. It is my unqualified judgment that the league of nations should be fully tested in its present form before being condemned, if for no other reason than that to reject it would be to discourage future attempts to obtain unity of action among the nations in the effort to avoid international conflicts. We can not as an influential power in the world assume such a responsibility.

"Admitting, for the sake of argument, all the faults and undesirable features which its bitterest opponents have raised against the covenant, I am prepared to say that it ought to be adopted and tried, for it represents to-day an international concert devoted to peace. The United States, I am convinced, will not be the nation to check this movement or to discourage the civilized States of the earth from seeking by united purpose and counsel to restrain the use of force in the settlement of their disputes. If, after a fair trial, the league fails to accomplish its objects, then is the time by amendment to make the covenant more efficient.

"Such action as that which was taken by the conference at Paris when it adopted the covenant makes for peace, but does not insure its permanency. It is a powerful agency, but not an all-powerful one. The only certainty of unbroken peace in this world, I believe, lies in the general adoption of democracy as the supreme political principle of all nations. Until that time comes we must use other agencies, but must not expect too much of them. Yet we should never lose sight of the real preventive or cease to advance the policy of democracy, of real democracy, among the nations.

"It fell to the lot of this country to demonstrate the might as well as the spirit of democracy. In this most critical time the United States accomplished all that had ever been claimed for it and more than had been expected of it. By its deeds it proved that a people acting in their sovereign right possess the will and the power to meet a foreign foe with vigor and success. We have lived through an epoch which tested our democratic institutions to the extreme, and we have stood the test. Thus in time of war democracy is magnificently vindicated.

"To-day new problems have arisen to try the efficiency of democracy. Victors over autocracy, we have discredited the system of class based upon birth and title, and we have now to meet a new classism as strongly though not as manifestly hostile to democracy and equality of individuals as the old classism. It is in foreign lands that this new enemy has most radically developed and openly attacked individual liberty. But this country is not free from the danger. To-day the rights of particular classes over other classes of our population are being preached in our streets, and appeals to selfishness, to envy, and to ignorance, under the guise of justice, are being sent broadcast throughout the land. Apostles of unrest and even of revolution, as well as others less radical and more sincere, taking advantage of the industrial and commercial confusion resulting from the war, are seeking converts to doctrines which aim to grant special privileges to certain groups of citizens and to deprive others of those private rights which are inseparable from the American conception of individual liberty.

"We must not close our eyes to the progress of events and to the tendency of the forces which are being exerted. We must not rest in a state of indifference or of false confidence. It is a time for action. Democracy is in danger from within rather than from outside the body politic. Again we, Americans, are called to the defense of the American principle which is being attacked not only by insidious foes but by friends who fail to see the wrong which they are doing. We must meet this new attack with the same unyielding and courageous spirit as that with which our soldiers met the Germans on the soil of France. It took us long to realize the great menace of German imperialism to the vital principle of our national life, but when it was realized we unitedly entered the conflict and fought on to victory. I believe that realization of the present danger will again call forth the best there is in this Republic and we will succeed in overcoming those who seek to pervert democracy by injecting into it a species of class imperialism which is more attractive than the ancient forms because it appeals to those who have suffered in the past from injustice and from denial of that equality of opportunity which it is the duty of democracy to maintain.

"No truer declaration was ever uttered than 'Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty,' and the American people ought to-day to take that thought to heart and resist every movement which is out of accord with the liberty and equality of the citizens of this Republic without distinction as to race, class, or condition. The dangers, as I see them, are a disposition to compromise the principle of equal rights with the demand for special rights; an apparent willingness to conciliate by concessions in order to avoid for the time being at least those evil conditions which threaten to result from the denial of class privileges; a timidity in meeting the issue squarely and boldly pointing out in what way it menaces the idea of democracy; and last, but by no means least, the tendency of many leaders of political thought to temporize with and placate certain elements of our population by accepting in a measure undemocratic doctrines which plainly violate the essential principle of the American political system.

"During the progress of a war opportunism, if it does not mean lawlessness, is always justifiable in the struggle for victory, but in time of peace when face to face with great social and economic problems, national and international, opportunism is the resort of shallow minds impelled by political ambition and greed for power, or by a moral cowardice which is as contemptible as it is un-American. We can not meet successfully the present problems by following leaders who, to advance their own political fortunes, counsel an abandonment of principle for the sake of expediency. By adopting such a policy we will weaken the American conception of democracy and encourage those who consciously or unconsciously strive for a classism which can not be reconciled to that conception. If we had listened to the opportunist, we would never have been an independent people; we would never have been a Union; we would never have entered the World War. If we listen to the opportunist now, America will never accomplish its promised destiny or prove to the world that democracy is capable of meeting any crisis, however grave, and of protecting individual liberty from its ancient enemy, special privilege, however disguised by popular phrase or pleasing epigram.

"Democracy has made this nation what it is. Democracy can make the world what it ought to be. Whatever may happen, we must not shrink from the duty of maintaining in this country democracy in its purity, and we must not cease our efforts to advance its cause throughout the earth. A great chapter of the history of the United States is being written in these days. It must not be recorded that we made 'the world safe for democracy,' but that we failed to make 'America safe for democracy.'

"Let us not forget what American democracy has done for human liberty. Let us not forget what democracy can do for universal peace. Democracy was worth fighting for and worth dying for, and it is worth guarding sacredly from every contaminating influence. With it as the dominant idea of our national life no American need fear for the future of this Republic. With it as the supreme political principle of the nations, we may look forward to an era of permanent peace."

STABILIZATION OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a memorial from members of the National Live Stock Exchange with regard to the stabilization of foreign exchange. It is only a short matter.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS ASKED TO STABILIZE FOREIGN EXCHANGE—PRESIDENT BROWN URGES IMMEDIATE ACTION IN EFFORT TO PREVENT PRICE BREAKS.

"CHICAGO, September 12, 1919.

"To all Members of Congress:

"A grave situation confronts the American farmer and unless prompt action is taken by the Congress of the United States thousands of farmers and live-stock producers will be financially ruined. This condition is already with us, and is becoming increasingly dangerous as time passes. I refer to the present state of foreign exchange and the constant depreciation in European money values.

"The Hon. Herbert C. Hoover, in his recent testimony before the congressional committee investigating war expenditures, pointed out the imminent danger in the following statement:

"'An extremely dangerous situation will result in case the United States Government does not assist producers in finding outlets for their goods. During the war American products of all kinds increased threefold. Unless there are permanent markets for these products a terrible reaction is inevitable, counteracting all the production incentives, which caused the present efficiency. The American Government must intervene by granting credits to the nations needing foods.

"'American farmers are entitled to the greatest consideration. After Government stimulation their production must be guaranteed markets.

"'Agricultural production in all the European nations is nearing a normal state, but the countries which have emerged from the war will need American financial assistance for another 18 months.

"'We are coming into a flood of production of foodstuffs in the northern hemisphere and again will have a great surplus in the United States. If, in the meantime, Europe has not found credits to purchase the coming winter's supplies, we are likely to have a glut and prices may fall below the cost of production to American farmers.'

"Our farmers have never before had occasion to concern themselves with the matter of foreign exchange, but present conditions must inevitably bring this subject home to them. The exporter of American farm products is facing the future with great uncertainty, and well he might.

"A study of current exchange rates as of Friday, September 12, 1919, showed the following:

"Conditions in some countries have reached the point where wage increases mean little or nothing to the laboring man since the increases are paid in depreciating money. German coal miners agreed to a longer day not for an increase in pay but provided they were given 2 pounds of lard, oleo, or other edible fats which their money can not buy.

"Foreign labor has never received the wages paid our workmen. Our mounting prices and wages to enable our people to meet them have brought our standard to a point Europe can never hope to attain. It stands to reason that their wages, even if accepted at face value, would not have the purchasing power to provide more than the mere necessities of life. Convert the purchasing power of this money at the present rate of exchange into American food and it is not to be wondered that food is more acceptable than money.

"It has come to the point where many of the European countries can not possibly finance the purchase of foods, notwithstanding that the specter of starvation or its near 'relative,' malnutrition, stalks abroad in their land. Our farmers have responded to the appeals of our Government and have produced foodstuffs in abundance, and this is now available for sale and distribution.

"This food has been produced under the handicap of higher wages and shorter hours, and the farmer justly expects his efforts to be rewarded by receiving a price commensurate with the cost of production. In the face of these conditions at home and abroad one of two things must occur, viz:

"1. American prices must be reduced to a point which will enable Europeans to purchase our products.

"2. American products must be consumed at home and the surplus of production will certainly lower present prices to a point where the producer must suffer tremendous losses.

"As pointed out by Mr. Hoover, the only apparent solution is for the Congress to arrange for the establishment of a fund which shall be available to protect the credit of the buying countries. I do not advocate that this be turned over to them to expend in increasing their military equipment, but that it shall be made available as loans upon proper security and solely for the purchase of American products, and particularly American farm products.

"This condition will automatically adjust itself as soon as the European countries reestablish their agricultural and industrial enterprises and once more resume the exportation of products. Exchange invariably adjusts itself to the balance of commerce, and when this point is reached the stabilization fund could be retired and normal conditions restored.

"There can be no doubt but that the present uncertainty and hazard of financing is largely responsible for the recent slump in our live-stock markets. The time of our heavy fall and early winter runs is at hand, and the packers must exercise care in filling their cellars—as they must do in the season of heavy runs—with high-priced meat, which can not later be sold except at a tremendous loss.

"This is a matter which deserves immediate attention, and I respectfully urge upon all Members of Congress the great importance of taking the necessary action to stabilize the foreign exchange before the disastrous effects are further felt by our live-stock producers."

THE IRISH QUESTION.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I observe in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the proceedings of Saturday, October 18, 1919, the speech of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], delivered in the Senate on the 14th instant. In the Senator's address will be found the following sentence:

It has not been many days ago, Mr. President, since I heard upon this floor a pretense that over 50 per cent of the American Revolutionary troops were Irish when we gained our independence.

Mr. President, in the latter part of the year 1778 and in the early part of the year 1779, during our American Revolution, there was dissatisfaction in England, and especially in Parliament, with reference to some of the movements of the English generals.

Severe strictures were made in Parliament against Sir William Howe, commander of the English forces on the American Continent, and a parliamentary investigation was had as to the evolutions and movements of the English troops in America.

Hon. Joseph Galloway, who had been for some 12 years speaker of the house of delegates or the house of assembly of the Pennsylvania Legislature, was called upon to testify before a joint committee of the two houses of Parliament. His testimony was published in the Royal Gazette, then printed by James Rivington, printer to the King, and in the issue of the Royal Gazette of October 17, 1779, the original of which is in the Congressional Library, so I am informed, and photographic copy of which I have here, the following testimony, among other things, was given by Mr. Galloway:

Q. That part of the rebel army that enlisted in the service of the Congress, were they chiefly composed of natives of America or were the greatest part of them English, Scotch, and Irish?

Mr. Galloway answered:

A. The names and places of their nativity being taken down, I can answer the question with precision. There was scarcely one-fourth natives of America; about one-half Irish; the other fourth were English and Scotch.

Mr. President, that is what appears in the Royal Gazette, published by Mr. Rivington, printer to the King, in its issue of October 17, 1779. Let me call attention to the fact that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] introduced a resolution some time in July, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States earnestly requests the American peace commission at Versailles to endeavor to secure for Edward De Valera, Arthur Griffiths, and Count George Noble Plunkett a hearing before said peace conference in order that they may present the cause of Ireland.

To this resolution an amendment was offered by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States express its sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of its own choice.

This amendment was adopted unanimously.

A roll call was then had upon the resolution as amended, and there were 60 yeas and 1 nay, the nay vote being the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I ask unanimous consent that that vote on the roll call may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The vote by yeas and nays referred to is as follows:

The result was announced—yeas 60, nay 1, as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Mississippi is a historian, and he can not deny that in the field of war the Irish race has furnished more luminaries than have been furnished by any other race in Europe. In our own Revolution we recall Gen. Greene; Gen. Richard Montgomery, who fell at Quebec and who was so highly esteemed as a soldier by that other great soldier, Aaron Burr, that when Montgomery fell at the head of his men, Burr rushed forward alone and, under fire of the English guns, carried back the precious body of Gen. Richard Montgomery; Gen. George Clinton, brigadier general, governor of New York, and twice Vice President, was an Irishman; Andrew Jackson, whom as a soldier and statesman neither man nor muse can praise too much, was born of Irish parents who came from Carrickfergus.

We perceive that the Duke of Wellington, the Iron Duke, was an Irishman. So were Lord Kitchener and Lord Roberts and Gen. French.

Gen. James Shields, Senator from three States, was an Irishman.

In our War between the States we remember Gens. Phil Kearney, McDowell, McCall, Thomas, Meagher, and gallant Pat Cleburn, all of Irish origin; and who does not recall the great triumvirate, Sherman, Sheridan, and Grant, all of Irish parentage? While on this subject let me remark that no more splendid figure arose out of the Civil War than the Irishman, Stonewall Jackson.

Charles Thomson, patriot, was born in Maghera, County Derry, Ireland, November 29, 1729. He was brought to this country in 1740, attended the academy of Francis Allison, and while still very young was made principal of a Friends academy at Newcastle, Pa. He was respected and trusted by the colonists, and was a prominent local leader during the strained relations with the mother country. He was the secretary in every Continental Congress, 1774–1789, and from the private memoranda that he made compiled a history of the Revolution.

It will be remembered that Judge James Wilson, the grandfather of President Wilson, was born in County Down, Ireland; that the ancestors of President James K. Polk came from Donegal, Ireland; that the ancestors of President James Buchanan and President McKinley came from the same vicinity; that the ancestors of President Arthur came from Antrim, Ireland; and that the mother of President Roosevelt was Irish.

Agricola, who was born A. D. 37 and lived until about A. D. 93, advised the empire builders of his day that—

Rome should war down and take possession of Ireland so that freedom might be put out of sight.

Thus, in this early Roman reference to Ireland we pick up for the first time the golden thread of Irish militant resistance to imperial exploitation, and this thread of courage and patriotism runs through all Irish history.

On the one side is the "warring down" so that freedom might be put out of sight, and on the other it is the eternal struggle to uphold the rights of free men.

Contemplating the Europe that existed before the Christian era, in the east we find Greece; in the west we find Ireland, and it is Ireland alone amongst the lands of western Europe that preserves the recorded traditions of its speech, culture, and song that connect the half of Europe with its ancestral past.

It was the Irish race that lit the lamp of genius in the brain of Europe.

When the unlettered Welch and English ancestors of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and myself were staring in mute amazement at the Phœnician and Carthaginian navigators who, before the Christian era, visited the Scilly Islands, then called the "Islands of Tin," to obtain a supply of that metal, the Irish race was fully acquainted with the use of precious metals, the fabrication of fine linens, was fond of music and song, and was enjoying its literature.

When the Druids at Stonehenge, on Salisbury Plain, made their last midnight sacrifice, the triennial council of the Irish people was held at the great hall or court of Tara where Irish kings and nobles assembled.

King Alfred the Great ascended the English throne in the year 871 A. D., and he was indeed one of the world's wisest and noblest men. He ruled for 30 years, and he proved himself to be a valiant warrior and an earnest patron of whatever promised to promote the good of his people, but long before Alfred ascended the English throne the Irish race had scattered throughout Europe manuscripts of priceless masterpieces limned by Irish scribes; such as the Book of Kells in the library of Trinity College at Dublin, acknowledged to be the most beautiful book in the world; indeed, into its pages are woven such a wealth of ornament and it has such an ecstasy of art that the colors are as lustrous, as fresh, and as soft as though it was the work of yesterday, but the book was made 1,200 years ago.

In the fields of oratory and poetry history swarms with the names of Irish orators and poets whose lips were touched by the Promethean fire, and I can do no better than to conclude by referring to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], a patriotic American of Irish parentage, who closed his able speech in the Senate on last Thursday with the following language:

We acted with magnanimity in the war; we shall not assume a mean and pusillanimous part in the constructive work of peace.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no intention of prolonging the discussion of which the very able speech of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is a part, but inasmuch as it now seems apparent that the vote on this treaty may largely depend upon the possession of the Irish vote, I shall at a later time attempt to show that neither party deserves it.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I make a very brief announcement.

Between 1 o'clock and 1.30 this afternoon a platoon of United States soldiers will give a drill in the open space in front of the Capitol. The significant part of this occasion is that of this platoon of troops not one could speak or write the English language three months ago. Half a dozen of us witnessed this platoon drilling and exercising this morning at 11 o'clock, and I think I can say that we were tremendously inspired by what we saw. In brief, it made us feel a little better about some of the problems that confront the Republic.

I merely wanted to urge as many Senators as possible to see this drill—it is well worthy of their time—and to estimate what these men have done under proper teaching in the Army in the very short time they have been in the service, remembering that they come from 14 different nations and three months ago could not speak or write a word of English.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to inquire from the Senator from New York what significance there is to the fact that they could not read or write English. Have they taken some educational training since entering the Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, Mr. President. These men have come from Camp Upton, on Long Island, where a battalion of 640 soldiers who have been enlisted in the Army during the last four months, and who could not speak or write English in any degree whatsoever, has been undergoing training. This platoon of something like 28 men, representing 14 nationalities, some coming from as far away as Persia, has been touring the country under the command of a couple of officers, giving these exhibitions; and I assure the Senator it is one of the most remarkable things I have ever seen.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was simply interested in the effort toward teaching them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a new work inaugurated in the Army during the last five or six years, and it illustrates what can be done by intelligent teaching and training, and, incidentally, toward bringing the Army closer to the people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator, along the same line that the Senator from Montana was pursuing, to what extent do these soldiers speak English now, after their three months' training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I spoke myself, and so did other Senators, with six or eight of them. They speak English quite readily. They understand anything you say to them. All the orders are given in English, and as they execute the commands they repeat the orders, with the numbering. It is really an astonishing achievement, and well worthy of the serious attention of men who are about to legislate on the reorganization of the Army and a permanent military policy for the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I want to indorse cordially everything that he has said about the exhibition which we witnessed this morning, and I wish every Senator would make it a point to see the next exhibition. It is a revelation of what can be done in military training properly carried on, both as to linguistics and as to military tactics and discipline.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, just a suggestion along the same line.

About a year before we entered the war the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate added a rider to an appropriation bill which provided for the vocational training of men in the different garrisons who might desire to take some form of vocational or industrial training. It authorized the Secretary of War, as I now recall, to select one of the garrisons to which men who desired to take this training might be ordered for instruction. Of course, the entrance of the United States into the war stopped any proceedings under that provision of the law; but the subject of vocational training has been and is being very seriously discussed by the Military Affairs Committee, and I believe the country has generally come to believe that men will be improved in their service to their country by taking a proper course of training. That is provided for in a bill for universal military training, if that is embodied in the Army reorganization plan; but even if it is not, it seems, Mr. President, that there is no better place to Americanize the men who join the Army than in this particular branch of the service. The Senator from New York might have called attention to the fact that the report of the Judge Advocate General of the Army showed an immense amount of illiteracy in all parts of the country. Much of that has been done away with by the training which these men received in the service.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have here a resolution adopted by the Stock Men's Club, of Spokane, Wash., with reference to the Kenyon and Kendrick bills relating to the packers. This club is incorporated. In a letter sending this resolution, they state that a membership of 60 was present and that the resolution was adopted unanimously. I ask permission to present the resolution, and that it may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That reference will be made.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from Clarence B. Miller, of Washington, D. C., containing extracts from the Duluth News Tribune describing the method by which alleged propaganda is being introduced into the public schools, intimating that it is done by the League to Enforce Peace, or that the material is furnished by them.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 17, 1919.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Apparently there is a species of propaganda on foot by the League to Enforce Peace to which public attention has not yet been directed. At least, I have not run across it.

The first concrete case to arise has just occurred at Duluth, Minn. The superintendent of schools at that point is a Mr. Hoke, who is a southern Democrat, having been brought two or three years ago from Richmond, Va., to Duluth to take charge of the Duluth system of public schools.

You will observe in the Duluth News Tribune, a Republican paper, published in the city of Duluth, under date of October 12, an exposé of the propaganda. It appears a little booklet has been issued purporting to give facts relative to the league of nations, but which actually contains a great deal of material which is purely propaganda. This attempt to seduce the minds of the youth of the land is brazen and without a parallel, so far as I know. It appears that immediately upon the exposition of the facts the board of education of the city of Duluth took action, and the book has been withdrawn. Please note the editorial under date of October 14 in the Duluth News Tribune, and the paragraph which has been marked, calling into bold relief the vicious misstatements contained in the propaganda part of the booklet. This is the only copy of this material which I have. Therefore, after you are through using this, if you care to use it at all, I will appreciate the favor if you will kindly return it to me.

Very sincerely, yours. C. B. MILLER.

"SCHOOL OUSTS PROPAGANDA OF PEACE LEAGUE—'BOOST' PAGE IN COVENANT BOOK IS DESTROYED AS RESULT OF NEWS TRIBUNE EXPOSÉ—BOOK NOT TO BE USED IN LANGUAGE WORK OR MEMORIZED, HOKE'S ORDER TO TEACHERS."

"Prompt action by school authorities yesterday followed the exposure in Sunday's News Tribune of the fact that a copy of the league of nations covenant was being made the vehicle of bald propaganda for the League to Enforce Peace. Copies of the covenant were 'called in' yesterday morning by teachers, the title-page destroyed, and an order issued by Supt. K. J. Hoke that the booklet be not used in language work or that any student be required to memorize any part of it.

"PRAISED LEAGUE PLAN.

"The action is exactly what the News Tribune sought.

"Objections to the booklet were not based on the text of the league covenant, but the fact that its title-page carried an evident attempt to create sentiment favorable to the league of nations.

"The title-page bore the following:

"'The Paris covenant for a league of nations; text of the plan adopted by the Paris peace conference, April 28, 1919.

"'A charter for world democracy; framed by the representatives of the victorious, free nations.

"'Extending to all the world the principles of the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Monroe doctrine.

"'Published by League to Enforce Peace, Bush Terminal Sales Building, 130 Forty-second Street, New York.'

"WHAT LEAGUE IS.

"The League to Enforce Peace carries on a nation-wide publicity campaign, through literature, meetings, press telegrams, and other propaganda, for the evident purpose of creating sentiment favorable to the ratification of the league of nations covenant without protection of American rights.

"Students in English classes were asked to produce the booklets when they reported yesterday. The title-pages were torn off and the books then returned to them, students said. In at least one other class the booklets were taken up altogether and the students informed that 'they would not be used any more.'

"Dr. Hoke issued the following statement on the matter:

"DR. HOKE'S STATEMENT.

"'The pamphlets on the league of nations were ordered by the superintendent, at the request of one of the high-school teachers, for the purpose of teaching current history in the high-school history department. The pamphlets were approved by the committee on schools before they were placed in the hands of the children. Information on the league is the only thing with which any person in the schools is concerned. There was no thought of propaganda.

"'The title-page, which has on it the only printing not related to the text, has been removed. No pamphlet will be permitted in the schools with the title-page on it. It will be used in connection with the history work for reference or reading. It will not be used in language work, nor will the children be asked to memorize any part of it.'

"He declined to make further comment on the episode."

"WHERE IT BELONGS.

"There is no impropriety in the covenant of the league of nations being used in high-school classes. It belongs there; it is current history and immensely important. Moreover, now is the time to use it. It is a matter of present interest. But where and how should it be used and from where should it come?

"Certainly it should not come from the League to Enforce Peace. This source of itself is so extremely partisan as to introduce it as partisan. Nor should it have any such introduction as the league's cover page, which proclaims it 'a charter for world democracy,' which it is not; 'framed by the representatives of the victorious free nations,' which it was not; 'extending to all the world the principles of the Constitution of the United States,' which it does not; 'and the Monroe doctrine,' which it does not and can not.

"In other words, it is put into the hands of high-school pupils with a series of bald misstatements. The principal of the school declined to tell where or how the books were secured or who had recommended them. But he said the text was to be read in the English classes and one or two parts were to be memorized.

"Right there is the absurdity of the situation. To use this covenant in English classes is inexcusable unless to show what to avoid and how diplomacy obscures its purposes in blind and hidden meanings. It is admittedly mighty poor English in expression and construction. To commit any part of it to memory as English is a travesty on what is worth while.

"But it does belong both in civics and in history. It points the way to teach both these subjects. Its framework belongs in civics as a form of government. The construction of the league as a governing body in contrast with the forms of government of the three countries whose representatives framed it would do much to arouse special interest of students in forms of government and for critical contrast.

"In history it should be far more than a topic of current history. It could be studied in connection with the treaties with Germany and Austria, in contrast with, say, the treaties of Vienna, Berlin, and Paris, which would arouse an immediate interest in the world of those days, what led up to those other treaties, what they did or tried to do, the world of then and now, and fix in the minds of pupils much of great value that otherwise would be read and forgotten.

"It may interest the school authorities also that digests of these two treaties, with the covenant complete and an excellent index, have been issued by the American Exchange Bank. It is an exceedingly valuable booklet, of which the high school could probably get enough copies for its civics and history classes for a nominal cost. It is all they need.

"The covenant alone has fair value; with the treaties it could be made of the greatest use and that without any more political taint than has all history and all civics. But to use the covenant in English classes is wholly without rhyme, reason, or sense."

[Duluth News Tribune, Oct. 12, 1919.]

"PROPAGANDA OF PEACE LEAGUE INVADES SCHOOL—CENTRAL HIGH STUDENTS TOLD TO MEMORIZE PORTIONS OF PARIS COVENANT, STUDY ITS TEXT—NOBODY SEEMS TO KNOW WHYS AND HOWS, BUT BOOKLET GETS INTO CURRICULUM ANYHOW.

"Bald propaganda for the league of nations covenant has found its way into the course of study at Central High School. Students in all English classes have been instructed to study copies of a booklet which is a palpable effort to set out only material favorable to the covenant, and have been told that they will be directed this week to memorize certain articles of the much-discussed document. The booklets, issued by the League to Enforce Peace, a prolific publicity bureau for the nations' league without protection of American rights, have been introduced into the school curriculum.

"ALL IN HANDY FORM.

"The title-page of the booklet bears the following inscription:

"'The Paris covenant for a league of nations; text of the plan adopted by the Paris peace conference, April 28, 1919.

"'A charter for world democracy; framed by the representatives of the victorious, free nations; extending to all the world the principles of the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Monroe doctrine.

"'Published by League to Enforce Peace, Bush Terminal Sales Building, 130 West Forty-second Street, New York,' together with the union printers' label.

"NO INSTRUCTION, SAYS YOUNG.

"Despite the obvious effort of the booklet to set out only the side favorable to the league covenant, Principal Leonard Young denied there was political bias in the introduction of the booklet. He declined to state where the booklets came from, whether or not the board of education had purchased them, or who had recommended them for use. He admitted the subject had been brought into the school curriculum and that the booklets were being made use of without specific instruction from the board.

"Such board members as could be reached were emphatic in their statement that they had nothing to do with it and that they would look into the matter.

"'The text is to be read in English classes at the high school and one or two parts are to be memorized,' Mr. Young said.

"'Is this addition to the curriculum under instructions from the board?' he was asked.

"BOARD NOT IN IT.

"'We don't have to ask the board about everything of that sort,' he said. 'The board doesn't tell us what to read in the schools. It is being read just the same as we read last year the book Democracy of To-day.'

"Questioned as to the book Democracy of To-day, Mr. Young said he could not recall its authorship, but that it was a book of essays.

"Mr. Young waxed indignant when asked about the circumstances under which the book on democracy and the booklet on the league covenant were introduced into the schools. 'You can find the democracy book in any library. The booklet on peace is not a textbook in the sense of the larger textbooks. It comes to pupils without charge,' he said.

"'Who furnishes it?' he was asked.

"WHERE DOES IT COME FROM?

"'That is a matter you will have to take up with the board. I don't think you will be able to find out where it comes from,' he replied.

"'The idea is simply to bring the text of the covenant before the pupils of more mature age,' he continued, 'just as we did with the book on Democracy of To-day.'

"'Have you read the inscription of the cover of the covenant copy, purporting to "give to all the world the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and so forth?"'

"'I didn't know there was anything special on the title-page,' he said. 'I wouldn't want to discuss it.'

"WHAT 'DEMOCRACY' CONTAINS.

"A copy of a book, Democracy of To-day, which is not listed at the Duluth Public Library, was furnished to the News Tribune last night by a high-school student, who said she had studied it last year under direction of her teacher, and that she was continuing the study in classes this year. The book is by Christian Gauss, a professor in Princeton University, with a portrait of President Wilson as the frontispiece, and the following principal articles:

"Lincoln's Gettysburg address, essay of Lowell on democracy, one speech by Lloyd-George, the Constitution of the United States, and 18 articles or speeches by latter-day Americans.

"Of the latter 18, 14 are by Woodrow Wilson, 1 is by Grover Cleveland, 1 by the late Theodore Roosevelt, 1 by Secretary Lane, of the administration Cabinet, and 1 by Elihu Root, formerly of Roosevelt's Cabinet.

"Teachers of English interviewed last night expressed fear that any comment of theirs might prejudice them in their positions.

"'In my classes there is no thought of international or American politics in the way we read the covenant booklet,' said Miss Harriet Gemmill, in charge of the English department at the high school.

"'I tell the students it makes no difference whether they are for the league of nations or opposed to it. They are to study it simply as a matter of current interest, as something they ought to know about simply as loyal citizens. Our personal convictions are not mentioned.'

"CRASSWELLER'S STATEMENT.

"'We don't want to put politics in the schools,' said Frank Crassweller, chairman of the committee on schools. 'On the other hand, anyone who studies current history must study the league of nations. The objectionable feature is the wording on the cover of the booklet introduced at Central. The inside of the pamphlet contains simply the text of the league of nations covenant.

"IGNORANT OF ORDER.

"'It may be that the copies from the League to Enforce Peace were obtained simply because they were easily available. I do not know who ordered the pamphlets.

"'I am satisfied that nothing is being used as a textbook unless arguments on both sides are being advanced. Sometimes an enthusiastic teacher advances his own ideas beyond what is proper. Sometimes a textbook is partisan. We recently decided to take from the courses a history textbook that became too political in the proposition of socialism and the controversy between capital and labor.

"'In this case I do not believe that anything is taught except the text of the covenant inside of the pamphlet.'

"OTHER STATEMENTS.

"Statements of other board members follow:

"R. J. Coole: 'I want to look into this matter immediately. I believe that after investigation the board will do what is right.'

"A. C. Le Due: 'Neither the purchase nor the acceptance of these booklets was authorized by the board in open meeting or otherwise, as far as I know. It is all news to me, and I am very much interested in it. I will give the matter attention.'"

SOCIALISTIC ACTIVITIES.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have it read. After the reading I shall ask unanimous consent to speak briefly to the Senate on the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 217) was read, as follows:

Whereas there is reason to believe that a number of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission have been, and now are, engaged in socialistic propaganda and in furthering the organization and growth of socialistic organizations; and

Whereas if Bolshevism, with all that it implies, is to be met and overcome in our country, it must be done by first ousting all its adherents and advocates from public office: Therefore be it

Resolved in the Senate of the United States, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to inquire into and report to the Senate at the earliest practical date upon the truthfulness of these charges; that said committee may conduct such inquiry by subcommittee or otherwise, and shall be empowered to hold sessions during the recess of the Senate; and for this purpose the committee or any subcommittee thereof is empowered to send for persons and papers, to employ whatever assistance, either clerical or legal, they deem necessary to aid in conducting the investigation, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, to conduct hearings and have reports of the same printed for use; and any expense in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to address the Senate upon this subject.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I inquire whether the resolution should not go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about it. That is where it will go; but the Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to address the Senate on the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh! I was under the impression that it was a request for present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if the Senator contemplates taking very much time, I shall object.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I think if the Senator from Florida will permit me to conclude what I have to say, it will not occupy more than 15 minutes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will not make the objection, then. I am anxious to get the consideration of the calendar.

Mr. WATSON. I know it will not exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the preamble to the resolution recite "Whereas it is alleged" that these things exist, or does it state that as a matter of fact they do exist?

Mr. WATSON. It says there is reason to believe they exist; and if the Senator will listen to what I have to say, he will learn the reasons upon which I base the belief.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I did not follow the Senator closely. Does the preamble say "Whereas there is reason to believe"?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The first preamble reads:

Whereas there is reason to believe that a number of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission have been, and now are, engaged in socialistic propaganda and in furthering the organization and growth of socialistic organizations.

Does that mean that they are doing this officially?

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That they are doing it as individuals?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly. I do not mean that they are employed for that purpose by the Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is a private matter which the Senator desires to inquire into?

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; and that they have been doing these things, if my information be correct—and I think it is—while they have been engaged as employees of the Federal Trade Commission in pursuing their official duties.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I notice that in the second "whereas" the Senator's resolution states:

If Bolshevism, with all that it implies, is to be met and overcome in our country, it must be done by first ousting all its adherents and advocates from public office.

Does the Senator confuse Bolshevism with socialistic beliefs?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have been for many years a student of socialism. I think I understand its underlying philosophy as advocated by its adherents and those who have espoused its doctrines, from Karl Marx down to the present time. Fundamentally there is no difference between socialism and Bolshevism. I do not care to discuss that proposition, however.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not any objection. I was simply rather surprised that the Senator should appear to confuse Bolshevism with socialistic beliefs.

Mr. WATSON. There is no question about the two being precisely the same, in that fundamentally they believe in the collective ownership of all the means for the creation of wealth, all the means for the distribution of wealth, and all methods of communication. That is the fundamental proposition. I can go into that at length, if the Senator cares to hear it; but it is apart from the object of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, for some weeks I have been investigating socialism in the various departments of the Government, and I have been astounded at the number of its adherents in office and the very solid manner in which they seem to be intrenched in our governmental affairs. From time to time I may call the attention of the Senate to the number of socialists engaged in the different departments and the methods of their activities, but my present purpose is to deal only with those employed by the Federal Trade Commission.

What I say in support of this resolution is in no wise a defense of the packers. Their activities are being investigated by another committee of this body. If they are guilty, they should receive the punishment they deserve; if they are innocent, they should be exculpated. With that investigation I am not familiar, nor is it my present purpose to discuss it. I mention it only to call attention briefly to the socialistic activities of some of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission who were chosen to investigate the operation of these corporations.

My theory is that, no matter what business is subject to investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, it is entitled to fair and decent treatment. The agents of the Government should be sent out to investigate and not to persecute. They should impartially collate the facts and transmit them to the Federal Trade Commission in order that that body may come to just conclusions concerning the questions involved. But in these cases that course has not always been pursued.

The following is an extract from the Report of the Federal Trade Commission on the Meat Packing Industry, Summary and Part 1, issued June 24, 1919:

> Walter Y. Durand, who had general charge of the investigation and of drafting the report; Francis J. Heney, who conducted the public hearings of inquiry and the investigation of facts connected therewith; Arthur B. Adams and Basil M. Manly, who assisted Mr. Heney in, respectively, the investigations and the hearings; Stuart Chase and Samuel W. Tator, who had general direction of investigating and accounts; and George A. Stephens, who had charge of the statistical work; and also with Mr. Adams, of the investigation of marketing methods. All the foregoing except Mr. Heney contributed in an important degree to the drafting of one or more parts of the report.
> Important aid in the preparation of portions of the report or in the investigation was given by William W. Bays, Vanderveer Custis, John H. Dynes, E. A. Goldenweiser, Earl S. Haines, A. S. Kravitz, William F. Notz, Johann G. Ohsol, Edwin C. Reed, and G. O. Virtue.
> Valuable assistance, especially in the field, was also rendered by Nelson M. Barrett, Lewis F. Bond, Robert M. Buck, W. W. Childs, L. T. Cowie, Sam Evans, Everett F. Haycraft, Byford E. Long, Hugh McIsaac, Donald D. Sells, and Walter M. Twombly.

The object is, it will be seen, to acknowledge the services of these men, and to extend the grateful thanks of the Federal Trade Commission to them for the service rendered.

Mr. President, all these employees are not Socialists nor have they been involved in socialistic activities, but some of them have been to a most amazing degree, and it is to them that I desire particularly to direct the attention of the Senate at this time.

My information is that Mr. Stuart Chase, as the above-acknowledgement recites, had general charge in Chicago of all the investigations of the meat-packing industry and supervision of all the investigations of independent packing companies throughout the United States. He was married in 1915 and, together with his wife, spent their honeymoon doing slumming work and making an investigation of a social character in Rochester, N. Y. They collaborated in writing a book called "A Honeymoon Experiment," which plainly shows the socialistic views of each. Since that time he has been a great contributor to magazines and newspapers of a socialistic character, and has written many articles against what he is pleased to call capitalism.

His office at Chicago, the office of the Federal Trade Commission, during the investigation of the meat packers was in the Conway Building and it at once became the center of socialistic activities. He organized and afterwards became the president of the Fabian Club, a society founded for the express purpose of furthering the doctrines of socialism. About him in the Federal Trade Commission headquarters were grouped such men as Victor Berger and Irvin St. John Tucker, both of whom have been indicted and convicted under the espoinage act, and many other extreme socialists, and his office became the rendezvous of a number of men devoted to the destruction of property, the overthrow of government, and the consummation of the ideals of socialism.

He was active in securing the attendance of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission at a meeting at the Coliseum in Chicago at which Victor Berger and other socialists and radicals made inflammatory speeches. He signed and approved a pamphlet called "What Happens in Military Prisons" and also a "Report of the Treatment of Conscientious Objectors at the Camp Funston Guardhouse." The latter pamphlet closes with this appeal:

> Do you not believe that now that the war is over and the ideals for which these men stand, right or wrong, can no longer have an influence upon the military success of this country, that a liberal Government can well afford to be generous with war's heretics? All of these men were usefully employed before the war and longed to serve their country in ways to which their consciences agreed. Is it not poor economy to deny them this privilege?

Under his direction there were issued a series of publications called "Fabian Tracts," all of which breathe the spirit of sedition and intense opposition to existing institutions, both financial and governmental. He was also instrumental in organizing a meeting at the Chicago Theater in January, 1918, at which Lincoln Steffens spoke. That anarchist had just returned from Russia and his address was delivered for the purpose of aiding in the recognition by our Government of Lenin and Trotski.

Chase wrote an article for the New Majority, an extreme radical paper, under date of July 5, 1919, in which he excoriated this Government for having failed to recognize the Russian soviet government.

It can be verified by affidavit that Chase instructed members of the Federal Trade Commission's investigating staff that in the event the figures obtained from the packer's books were not the equivalent of those submitted by the packers in their various financial statements, they should in all cases take the larger figures. In a number of instances it so happened that the figures obtained by the Federal Trade Commission from the packers' books were not as large as those submitted by the various packing companies, and in each case the Federal Trade Commission used the larger figures which would be arrived at by putting back various reserves into profits, thereby inflating the profits, all of which was done upon Chase's positive instructions.

During all of this time the office of the Federal Trade Commission in the Conway Building, under his instructions and with his active consent, became the headquarters of all the active members of the Fabian Club, including such men as Tucker and Berger and the other socialistic members of the Federal Trade Commission.

Samuel W. Tator, who, with Stuart Chase, had general charge of investigations, is well known in socialistic circles. During this time he was an avowed admirer of Lenin and Trotski and frequently expressed his admiration of the soviet government of Russia. He was an active member of the Fabian Club and was pronouncedly against the Allies in the World War. He was an intimate friend of Chase, always met with the other members of the Federal Trade Commission, and to them frequently made the statement that all big business should be confiscated and owned by the Government.

After the armistice was signed he warned his fellow investigators of the Federal Trade Commission that the Washington office had notified the Chicago office to cease all revolutionary activities, stating that if they continued they would get into trouble with the Department of Justice.

My further information is that Mr. A. S. Kravitz, then and now in the employ of the Federal Trade Commission, is a Russian from Riga; that he is a graduate of several universities and is an intellectual socialist of the most radical type. Throughout the war he was intensely pro-German, as his many utterances testify. He has always expressed himself as an ardent admirer of Lenin and Trotski and claims to be a personal friend of Lenin. Frequently he stated to his fellow employees that he was heart and soul for the German cause and on many occasions made the statement that he did not believe in aggregations of wealth or property, and that they should all be taken from the corporations and owned by the Government.

My further information is that Raphael Mallen was born in the United States but raised in Mexico; that he studied for the ministry, and for a time preached, but was afterwards expelled from the church for his socialistic utterances and practices. He was in an Army prison at Camp Grant in the summer and fall of 1917 on account of being a conscientious objector, and secured his release by using his previous training for the church as a pretext. He attended all the Fabian Club meetings and was pronounced in his socialistic utterances. Mr. Mallen has written for various socialistic publications, all of them inveighing against the existing order of things and insisting on a complete change in our social program. He frequently waved a red flag at the meetings of his coemployees of the Federal Trade Commission and always carried the red emblem in his pocket. He openly made the statement that his home in Chicago had been raided several times, and that after the raiders left he brought his socialistic writings to Mr. Chase's headquarters in the Federal Trade Commission office, Conway Building, and boasted that the bags containing these papers and writings were "Government dynamite." He acted in the capacity of statistician and was more seditious in his remarks to the members of the Federal Trade Commission staff than anyone else of that body. He was under constant suspicion by the Government authorities of Chicago, and frequently attended meetings at the Clarion Book Shop, 204 North Clark Street, Chicago, with Chase, Kravitz, Berger, Ohsol, Tator, Buck, Manly, Sorber, Haines, and others seeking socialistic literature.

R. N. Buck is the editor of a radical magazine called the New Majority, which is published in Chicago. It purports to be an organ of the American Federation of Labor and also of the Labor Party of Chicago, but I have no means of knowing whether or not this is true. I suspect its truthfulness, however, because it is far more radical than the utterances of the official organs of the American Federation of Labor.

Buck is a frequent contributor to radical newspapers and magazines, and his articles are always devoted to attacks upon the rights of property and upon our institutions of government.

My information is that Basil L. Manly was employed for a time by the Federal Trade Commission in Chicago, along with the others whose names I have given and shall give, to investigate packers. He belonged to the Fabian Club, frequently conferred with all the other Socialists in Chase's headquarters, was a constant visitor at the office of the Clarion Book Shop, and was and is a frequent contributor to radical papers.

He wrote an article for the American Labor Yearbook of 1917–18 entitled "Distribution of Railroad Ownership in the United States," assailing individualistic ownership and covertly advocating Government ownership of these utilities. He has published several articles in a paper called Reconstruction that are exceedingly seditious in character. It is fair to say that many of the articles contained in this magazine are patriotic and in no wise seditious, but those by Manly manifest a distinct disposition on his part to overturn the existing order of things; in other words, to bring about a social and political revolution. An article published by him in this magazine, June, 1919, expresses his sentiment on anti-Bolshevistic propaganda and on the incarceration of Eugene Debs in this language:

> There has been, it seems to me, quite recently a decided change in the entire national psychology. A few weeks ago the persecutory mania which had been developed partly as a result of the overstrain of war conditions and partly as a direct result of malicious propaganda reached the climax. The witch-burning fever was at its height. All that was needed was to call some mild-mannered agitator a Bolshevik in order to rally a mob of silk-hatted fanatics ready to consign the innocent victim to the flames or hang him to a lamp-post.
> Leagues for the suppression of Bolshevism were being organized every morning by enthusiastic press agents who were out of jobs and saw a chance to shake down the terrified capitalists for a few thousand dollars for "organizing expenses."
>
> Almost every morning the newspapers carried unverified reports that secret service agents had unearthed insidious nation-wide plots to assassinate the President, to establish a Bolshevik government in America, or to do any one of a hundred other fantastic things that the fevered imagination of the particular press agent might conjure up.
> The crisis came, I believe, when Eugene Debs was sent to serve his 10-year sentence in the Moundsville Penitentiary. The intense wave of feeling which swept over the country when Debs was sent to prison seems to have brought a realization to many, if not all, the leaders of the forces of reaction that they had gone far enough, and, perhaps, too far.

Manly continued his relations with the Federal Trade Commission in Chicago until their headquarters were closed, after which he was appointed a member of the War Labor Board to succeed Frank P. Walsh, a socialist of as radical a type as himself.

He continued his relations with this board until recently, when he resigned to take a position with the Newspaper Enterprise Association, a publicity association organized by William L. Colver, a member of the Federal Trade Commission.

Johann G. Ohsol was at one time a member of the Russian Duma, afterwards, he says, exiled to Siberia, from which he escaped, he being the second Russian red in the employ of the Federal Trade Commission.

Ohsol is a pronounced socialist, has written frequently for radical newspapers and magazines, and in the Labor Yearbook of 1917–18 published a screed on "Socialism and economic conditions," which clearly sets forth his views with reference to our governmental institutions and to the right of the individual to own and enjoy private property. He is a soviet of the most virulent type, and never fails to express the greatest admiration for Lenin and Trotski.

My information is that Martin L. Sorber is a friend and admirer of Irvin St. John Tucker and Victor Berger. In the issue of the Chicago Socialist of November 16, 1918, there appears an advertisement for a mass meeting on the following Sunday to mark the city's rejoicing over the downfall of the Kaiser. I read a part of it in order to show the character of this publication and the part that Sorber played in the socialistic parade on that occasion:

> It is coming—the Chicago worker's celebration of the coming of peace, the town of socialism, the first anniversary of the Russian soviet republic and the outbreak of the German revolution.
> Every socialist in the city will be there. The ward branches will occupy allotted places in the Auditorium, with standards flying.
>
> The same will be true of all the foreign-language organizations, including the recently organized Greek society and an organization of Chinese socialists now in the making.
>
> Seymour Stedman, counsel for the National Socialist Party, who has defended socialists from coast to coast during America's participation in the war, will be on the list of speakers.
>
> Chicago's five indicted socialists, who will be placed on trial Monday, November 25, according to present arrangements, will speak.
>
> First of all Victor L. Berger, socialist Congressman elect, will tell his plans for bringing the socialist program before the next Congress.
> J. Louis Engdahl will predict the time when Chicago socialists will take over the Tribune, the official organ of the local plutocracy, just as the German socialists in Berlin took over the Lokal Anzeiger, formerly the Kaiser's favorite paper, rechristening it the Red Flag, and using it to exploit the message of the workers.
>
> Irvin St. John Tucker, now head of the Workers' Institute, will tell how to educate the workers of the Nation to a realization of the real meaning of socialism.
> Irvin St. John Tucker is chief marcher of the parade. Martin L. Sorber is chairman of the committee on banners.

This shows the company in which this and other members of the Federal Trade Commission were always found in Chicago.

After the Federal Trade Commission closed its headquarters in the Conway Building, Sorber used the office of Tucker in which to write up his reports to the Federal Trade Commission, he being at that time employed by the commission at the rate of $7 a day to make independent investigations of the so-called "big-five packers in Chicago," and Sorber continued on the pay roll of Irvin St. John Tucker during the time he was making these supplementary investigations as a member of the Federal Trade Commission.

My information is that Daniel A. Kemper was in the employ of the Federal Trade Commission in Chicago; that he belonged to the Fabian Club; that he met with the other socialists at the office of the Clarion Book Shop; that he was open and avowed in his seditious utterances among his fellow employees at Chase's headquarters; and that he was always active in scattering socialistic propaganda. He was with the Federal Trade Commission, be it said to their honor, but three months.

Mr. Earl S. Haines was another one of these employees who was always active in socialistic endeavor. On one occasion he condemned in unmeasured terms the publications of American newspapers regarding the soviet government in Russia, saying that they were not telling the truth about it, but were trying to discredit the movement by telling of riots and bloodshed in that country. He openly asserted that the soviet government in Russia was the greatest government in the world and that he would never be satisfied until we had one like it in America.

My information is that Mrs. Baldwin, who acted in the capacity of accountant and stenographer in the headquarters of the Federal Trade Commission in Chicago, was an anarchist of the most pronounced type. She was always open and vigorous in all her remarks, and at the time the bomb was exploded at the conclusion of the I. W. W. trial by Judge Landis, she exclaimed in the presence of her coemployees, "It served them right." This, too, regardless of the fact that a number of lives were lost.

My information is that an anarchist parade occurred in Chicago after the signing of the armistice in which Stuart Chase, A. S. Kravits, Martin L. Sorber, and Daniel A. Kemper, all members of the Federal Trade Commission, marched until intercepted by the authorities. They all carried red flags and wore red neckties. The procession was broken up by the police authorities and the representatives of the Department of Justice; these four men were taken into custody until their flags were taken from them. On the next day Irvin St. John Tucker telephoned from Chase's office, Federal Trade Commission, to the headquarters of the Department of Justice in Chicago and insisted on the return of the flags thus captured, and the numerous socialist employes of the Federal Trade Commission at that time were loud in their denunciation of the act of the authorities in breaking up the parade and seizing the flags.

Mr. President, I am by nature a conservative. This makes me cautious in making charges based upon mere rumors or idle gossip. I have not done so in this instance, and I believe that, if the Senate will order the investigation for which my resolution asks, every assertion I have made can and will be substantiated.

We introduce many resolutions in this body on Bolshevistic activities, but nothing results. We talk much but do little, and yet all believe that something must be done to overcome the socialistic tendency of the time, and especially to prevent socialists from seizing the reins of government.

Senators, if socialists and anarchists are recognized in official life, they will not be condemned in private life. If they are fostered and protected by the Government, they will flourish in business and industrial institutions, and we will not succeed in overcoming the Bolshevistic tendency of the day unless we oust from office every red radical holding a place under the Government.

Men sent out by the Federal Trade Commission should be investigators and not persecutors; they should impartially find the facts and should fearlessly report them. Men ought not be selected to represent the Government who are against all government. We had as well choose atheists to reform the principles of the church. Men who are opposed to our existing institutions should never be chosen to protect them, and no agency of the Government bent on the enforcement of the laws has a right to select as its representatives those who are opposed to all law and hostile to all government. These acts are subversive of the very foundations of government, and should the practice continue will inevitably result in its overthrow.

If my information be correct, the headquarters of the Federal Trade Commission in Chicago during the time they were open were centers of sedition and anarchy from which radiated the most baleful influence. If men in the Government employ scatter dragon's teeth and sow the seeds of discord, how can we condemn the man on the street or in the office or in the shop for following their advice and emulating their example The place to begin reform is where the evil does the greatest harm and works the greatest destruction, and that is in the departments of government.

I shall not pursue this further to show you the activities of some of the other employees of the Federal Trade Commission in Chicago at that time, but I trust I have mentioned enough to demonstrate that that office was, during all that period, a center of radicalism, a nesting place for socialists, a spawning ground for sovietism, and that, while professing to investigate business with a view to eradicating its evil features, they constantly plotted for the destruction of the business they were charged to investigate and for the confiscation and collective ownership of all the means for the creation and the distribution of wealth.

If these charges be true, and on my responsibility as a Senator I charge that my information warrants the belief that they are, these facts should be known to the people. If they can be substantiated, the business world has a right to know the character of the investigation to which they may be subjected, and the people have the right to be informed as to the misfeasance and malfeasance of their public servants; Congress has the right to know who appointed men of that type to official positions, not alone that they may oust all those who have so outraged the trust imposed in them, but that they may also call to a speedy account the men responsible for their selection.

I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

SHORTAGE OF SUGAR.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I noticed in the papers yesterday that the Harriman National Bank, of New York City, had inserted a paid advertisement in some paper stating that the shortage of sugar was caused by "inefficient Washington." We know that there is a great strike in New York and some 40,000 longshoremen have shipping and handling of freight tied up. So it seems to me that if this national bank, which receives its existence from the Government and is acting under a charter of the Government, would endeavor to settle the strike in their own city, in order that a large quantity of produce there, which is going to waste, could be saved, that they would be doing a much better service than taking the stockholders' money illegally and unlawfully and trying to encourage unrest and dissatisfaction in the country. A bank is chartered to do a banking business. It is not chartered to misrepresent or vilify the Government, and I feel that this is nothing less than a misappropriation of funds, and that their charter should be revoked. If anybody has any respect for themselves or respect for their posterity, they should stop encouraging unrest in this country and allow our conditions to become normal. We would not expect a bank to encourage anything of that sort at least. We are told that there is plenty of sugar in New York if it could be handled.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500, to compensate Elizabeth Marsh Watkins, of Wakpala, S. Dak., for permanent bodily injuries sustained by her on the 9th day of November, 1908, at the Government Indian school at Flandreau, S. Dak.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota something about this bill. Upon what foundation does it rest?

Mr. STERLING. This bill has already once passed the Senate, and I can say to the Senator from Utah that I think it a most meritorious measure. This Indian girl was attending the Indian school at Flandreau, S. Dak. She was engaged in work in the laundry; the machinery with which she had to work was defective, according to the statement of the superintendent of the school, and she received a permanent injury so that the fingers of her hand are useless, and she is, one might say, a physical wreck from that injury.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is there any fund in the Indian Bureau with which to meet claims of this character?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think there is.

Mr. KING. My information is that there is a fund set aside in some branch of the Indian Service to meet claims of this character.

Mr. STERLING. It is not my understanding that there is any such fund. If the Senator will refer to the report of the committee, he will find there affidavits of physicians and surgeons who have examined this girl.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator another question. Does the Senator think it wise to give this sum directly to the Indian girl? The report does not seem to indicate her age.

Mr. STERLING. I most certainly do. Where a person is attending a Government school, as this young girl was, and while doing work for the Government in the laundry is injured because of defective machinery in the laundry, the Government ought to afford compensation.

Mr. KING. The Senator does not understand my question. The point was whether the appropriation ought to be made directly to this young Indian girl or whether or not it ought to go to some guardian ad litem or general guardian.

Mr. STERLING. The girl is now married, and I see no objection to it going directly to her.

Mr. KING. If the person is competent to handle the fund, I have no objection at all.

Mr. STERLING. She is.

Mr. KING. But it seems to me if the beneficiary were a person of immature years the money ought to go to a guardian, so that it could be handled under direction of the court and not be misapplied or wasted.

Mr. STERLING. Intellectually she is a very bright woman.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if any portion of this fund will go for attorney's fees?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think any of it will go for attorney's fee, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin. She made her own application; this bill was introduced directly here. I know of no attorney in the case, and I do not think there is any attorney or that she has ever had an attorney.

Mr. KING. I submit to the Senator, would it not be a good idea to provide that the entire amount shall go to her and not any portion of it to any attorney or agent?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think there is any danger of that. If I thought there was I would be willing so to provide; but I do not believe she ever had an attorney. The husband of the woman and the woman herself have both seen me, and I do not think there is any such danger.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2377) to amend section 1 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, so as to provide for the payment of the expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Board and employees by the Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let that go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I just want to make a statement, and then I shall not object to the bill going over.

All that this bill means is this: In the past the expenses of the Federal farm-loan banks, amounting to $143,000 per year, have been paid by the Government. This bill provides that the banks themselves shall pay that expense. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and nobody holds for a minute that the expense of maintaining the banks should not be paid by the banks themselves.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I will state that I merely desire an opportunity to look into the bill, and that is the reason why I ask that it go over on this call of the calendar. I do not mean to say that I shall be opposed to it later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 56) to enable the United States to participate in the work of the International Aircraft Standards Commission, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the absence of the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 1199) to prohibit the purchase, sale, or possession for the purpose of sale of certain wild birds in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 172) for the selection of a special committee to investigate the administration of the Office of the Alien Property Custodian was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2978) to establish additional fish-cultural subsidiary stations in the State of Michigan was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SISSETON AND WAHPETON BANDS OF SIOUX INDIANS.

The bill (S. 126) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to permit the Yankton and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians to intervene in the action of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States (Docket No. 33731), and to hear, determine, and render judgment in said action in claims of Yankton and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the word "the," to strike out the word "Yankton" and insert "Yanktonai"; on line 6, page 1, to make the same amendment; on page 2, lines 5, 9, 12, 15, and 19, and on page 3, line 16, to make the same amendment, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians may intervene in the action of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States, and that all claims of whatsoever nature which the Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians may have or claim to have against the United States shall be submitted in said above-named action to the Court of Claims, with due right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by any party for the amount due or claimed to be due said Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands from the United States under any treaties or laws of Congress, and to establish that the claims presented in said action are not due to the said Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians, but that the same are due to the said Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine all claims of said Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States, and also any legal or equitable defense, set-off, or counterclaim which the United States may have against said Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians, and to enter judgment; and in determining the amount to be entered herein, the court shall deduct from any sums found due said Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians any and all gratuities paid said bands or individual members thereof subsequent to March 3, 1863: Provided, That in determining the amount to be entered herein, the value of the land involved shall not exceed the value of such land on March 3, 1863. If any such question is submitted to said court, it shall settle the rights, both legal and equitable, of said bands of Indians and the United States, notwithstanding lapse of time or statute of limitations. Such action in the Court of Claims shall be presented by a single petition in intervention, which shall set forth all the facts on which the said bands of Indians base their claims for recovery; and the said petition may be verified by the agent or authorized attorney or attorneys of said bands, to be selected by said bands and employed under contract approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of existing law, upon information or belief as to the existence of such facts, and no other statements or verifications shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, reports, and public records, or certified copies thereof, and oral testimony, depositions, and sworn statements by members of said bands of Indians may be used as evidence. Whatever moneys may be found due the Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands of Indians under the provisions of this act, less attorney's fees, shall be placed to their credit in the Treasury of the United States: Provided further, That the compensation to be paid the attorney or attorneys for the claimant Indians shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, but in any event shall not be greater than the amount named in the approved contract.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to permit the Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians to intervene in the action of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States (Docket No. 33731), and to hear, determine, and render judgment in said action in claims of Yanktonai and Cuthead Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States."

LANDS IN CROW RESERVATION, MONT.

The bill (S. 193) to cancel the allotment of Little Bear, deceased Indian of the Crow Reservation, Mont., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to cancel the allotment of Little Bear, deceased, Crow allottee No. 1654, covering the north half of the south half of section 14, township 7 south, range 35 east, Montana meridian, containing 160 acres.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 806) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Iowa Tribe of Indians against the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas the purpose of these bills. Is it to compel the Government of the United States to make payment out of the Treasury of the United States or to make payment for certain claims which may be established out of funds belonging to Indian tribes?

Mr. CURTIS. This is a claim against the Government of the United States, and permits the Government to set up any set-off it may have. It is a bill introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and it might go over until he is here if the Senator objects. I suggest that it go over until the Senator from Oklahoma arrives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

IRRIGATION SYSTEMS ON THE BLACKFEET RESERVATION, MONT.

The bill (S. 1329) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain Indian lands necessary for reservoir purposes in connection with the Blackfeet Indian reclamation project was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to expend the sum of $5,944.93 from any money now available for construction of irrigation systems on the Blackfeet Reservation, in Montana, in the purchase of lands embraced in the allotments of George W. Cook and David La Breche, described as lots 3 and 5, section 27, and lots 1 and 2, section 34, township 32 north, range 13 west, in consideration of the relinquishment by the allottees of all their right, title, and interest in and to said lands, and of their right to select lieu land under the provisions of section 14 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L., pp. 855, 859), and the release of all their claims whatsoever against the United States or the Blackfeet Tribe of Indians by reason of said lands being required for reservoir purposes in connection with the irrigation system on the aforesaid Indian reservation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted that this is a reimbursable fund or appropriation; is it not?

Mr. CURTIS. It is reimbursable, like all other irrigation funds. This bill is simply to get this additional land that is needed in carrying out the project. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SMOOT. Is this project to benefit the Indian lands, or the Indian lands and those of the white settlers as well?

Mr. CURTIS. My recollection is that it embraces both. I will ask the Senator from Montana if that is not so?

Mr. SMOOT. Can the Senator from Montana tell me what proportion of each is benefited?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This is purely an Indian reservation project. The original project contemplated the irrigation of quite a body of lands outside of the reservation; but the work has never been extended to those, and they were thrown open to public settlement some time ago. I may say to the Senator, however, that the settlers are now appealing to the Government to rescind the order heretofore made and to include the lands outside; but up to the present time nothing has been done, and all the expenditures have been made within the reservation.

Mr. SMOOT. And wholly on Indian lands?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. I wish the Senator to understand that the original survey included the lands outside as well as the lands inside.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to say that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL AIRCRAFT STANDARDS COMMISSION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am given to understand that in my absence a few moments ago a request was made that Senate joint resolution 56 be passed over. I believe the request was made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes, Mr. President. I merely desired that such an important matter should not be taken up in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, thinking that he might be able to give us some information concerning it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it in order to return to that joint resolution at this time and ascertain if there is objection to its consideration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done. Is there any objection?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 56) to enable the United States to participate in the work of the International Aircraft Standards Commission, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, upon the recommendation of a committee consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce, delegates to the International Aircraft Standards Commission, at least two of whom shall be officers of the aeronautical, technical, or engineering staffs of the War Department and the Navy Department; to give official approval of the purposes, rules of procedure of said commission, and to publish its recommendations from time to time as he may deem advisable; and to appoint members of advisory committees of the commission and members of the National Aircraft Standards Committee, upon the recommendation of the committee heretofore designated to recommend the appointment of delegates to the International Aircraft Standards Commission.

SEC. 2. That for the current fiscal year the actual and necessary expenses of delegates to the International Aircraft Standards Commission, or authorized agents on special duty, at home or abroad, for standardization purposes, including the sum of $1,000 for the payment of the proportionate share of the United States in the maintenance of the central office of the International Aircraft Standards Commission, and not exceeding in the aggregate $6,000, shall be paid from any other funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated upon certificates of the Secretary of War that the expenditures are necessary for the study of the development of aircraft production for military purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York tell us what the International Aircraft Standards Commission is?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this matter has been pending for several months. It seems, if my recollection is correct, that shortly before the close of hostilities the allied Governments—especially England, France, Italy, Canada, and the United States—agreed to establish an International Aircraft Standards Commission in order to make an effort to standardize certain technical terms, to standardize certain articles of equipment which are already in common use, and with respect to which there is no longer any dispute as to their value. The whole matter, I may say to the Senator from Montana, is exceedingly technical.

A meeting of the commission was called for last June. Unfortunately the United States could not be represented at the meeting, because the Congress had not authorized the sending of delegates for such a purpose. The meeting was postponed by the other powers in order to give the United States a chance to authorize the sending of delegates; and since last June the meeting has been successively postponed several times, until I may say that to-day the situation has become exceedingly embarrassing. We must either decide that we shall take advantage of this forum for the discussion of the technical matters connected with aviation or that we shall not take advantage of it. In other words, the other Governments can not be expected to wait much longer.

Every person with whom we have discussed the matter in the Military Affairs Committee states that America has everything to gain and nothing to lose by becoming a member of this international commission. The fact is, several of the other nations are far ahead of us in the development of aviation. If we can only have our delegates meet with these other people from time to time and absorb some of the knowledge and experience that the others have and bring it back here it will do our aviation a lot of good; and, in fact, the War Department and the Navy Department and all branches of the Government interested in aviation are exceedingly anxious that the United States should take part in this movement.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Do I understand that the various Governments are perfectly willing to reveal to each other all of the improvements which they have made in mechanical devices connected with aircraft, and to reveal all of the information which they have obtained relative to the development in aircraft production?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not certain that each and every Government is willing to reveal everything it knows; but it is not for the purpose of exchanging secrets now that the war is over. The first purpose of it was to enable each of the Allies to understand what the others were doing; but from now on it is apparent that this flying game, if I may call it such, is to grow into tremendous proportions, and it is the desire of these Governments, and the desire of the authorities of the United States, to confer one with the other as to the standardization of technical terms, the standardization of tests of strength and safety, so that when a Frenchman discusses these technical matters he will discuss them in terms which can be understood by an American technical man. That is the real purpose of the commission. I think it is one of great value, and that we ought to take advantage of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment to strike out the preamble, and the amendment was agreed to.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, as speedily as possible, after the passage of this act, prepare a complete roll of the members of the Crow Tribe who died unallotted after December 31, 1905, and before the passage of this act; also a complete roll of the allotted members of the tribe who at the date hereof are living and are heads of families but have not received full allotments as such; also a complete roll of the unallotted members of the tribe living six months after the approval of this act who are entitled to allotments. Such rolls, when completed, shall be deemed the final allotment rolls of the Crow Tribe, on which allotment of all tribal lands and distribution of all tribal funds existing at said date shall be made. The rolls shall show the English as well as the Indian name of the allottee; the age, if living; the sex; whether declared competent or incompetent; the description or descriptions of the allotments; and any other fact deemed by the Secretary of the Interior necessary or proper. Said rolls shall be completed within one year after the approval of this act.

SEC. 5. That such of the unallotted lands as are now used for agency, school, cemetery, or religious purposes shall remain reserved from allotment so long as such agency, school, cemetery, or religious institutions, respectively, are maintained for the benefit of the tribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, upon the request of the tribal council, is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be issued a patent in fee to the duly authorized missionary board or other proper authority of any religious organization heretofore engaged in mission or school work on the reservation for such lands thereon as have been heretofore set aside and are now occupied by such organizations for missionary or school purposes: Provided further, That not more than 640 acres may be reserved for administrative purposes at the Crow Agency, and such lands shall be definitely described and made a matter of record by the Indian Office.

SEC. 6. That any and all minerals, including oil and gas, on any of the lands to be allotted hereunder are reserved for the benefit of the members of the tribe in common and may be leased for mineral purposes, upon the request of the tribal council under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, but no lease shall be made for a longer period than 10 years, but the lessees shall have the right to renewal thereof for a further period of 10 years upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, however, That allotments hereunder may be made of lands classified as valuable for coal or other minerals which may be patented as herein provided with a reservation, set forth in the patent, of the coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits for the benefit of the Crow Tribe: And provided further, That at the expiration of 50 years from the date of approval of this act the coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits upon or beneath the surface of said allotted lands shall become the property of the individual allottee or his heirs.

SEC. 8. That any allotment or part of allotment provided for under this act, irrigable from any irrigation system now existing or hereafter constructed by the Government on the said reservation, shall bear its pro rata share, computed on a per acre basis, of the cost of constructing such system: Provided, That no additional irrigation system shall be established or constructed on the Crow Reservation until the consent of the tribal council thereto has been duly obtained. All charges against allotments authorized by this section may be reimbursed in not less than 20 annual payments, and the Secretary of the Interior may fix such operation and maintenance charges against such allotments as may be reasonable and just, to be paid as provided in rules and regulations to be prescribed by him. Unless otherwise paid, these latter charges may be paid from or made a charge upon his individual share of the tribal fund when said fund is available for distribution; and if any allottee shall receive patent in fee to his allotment before the amount so charged against his land has been paid, such unpaid amount shall become and be a lien upon his allotment, of which a record shall be kept in the office of the superintendent of the reservation at the agency; and should any Indian sell any part of his allotment, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the amount of such unpaid charges against the land so sold shall remain a first lien thereon, and may be enforced by the Secretary of the Interior by foreclosure as a mortgage. All expenditures for irrigation work on the Crow Reservation, Mont., heretofore or hereafter made, are hereby declared to be reimbursable under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and shall constitute a lien against the land benefited, regardless of ownership, and including all lands which have heretofore been sold or patented. All patents or other instruments of conveyance hereafter issued for lands under any irrigation project of the said Crow Indian Reservation, whether to individual Indians or to purchasers of Indian land, shall recite a lien for repayment of the irrigation charges, if any, remaining unpaid at the time of issuance of such patent or other instrument of conveyance, and such lien may be enforced or, upon payment of the delinquent charges, may be released by the Secretary of the Interior. In the case of lands under any project purchased in the bona fide belief on the part of the purchaser that by his purchase he acquired a right to have water from the system for the irrigation of the land purchased by him in the same manner as the Indian owner, the Secretary may, after notice to the Indians interested, determine the value of the land at the time of the purchase from the Indians, and give to the purchaser or his assigns credit on the charge for construction against the land to the amount of the difference between the price paid and the value as so determined, and shall withhold for the benefit of the tribe from the Indian or Indians of whom the purchase was made, an equal amount from any funds which may be due or distributable to them hereunder. Delivery of water to such land may be refused, within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, until all dues are paid: Provided, That no right to water or to the use of any irrigation ditch or other structure on said reservation shall vest until the owner of the land to be irrigated shall comply with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and he is hereby authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be deemed reasonable and proper for making effective the foregoing provisions: Provided, however, That in no case shall any allottee be required to pay either construction, operation, or maintenance charges for such irrigation privileges, or any of them, until water has been actually delivered to his allotment: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be made immediately, if not already made, an itemized statement showing in detail the cost of the construction of the several irrigation systems now existing on the Crow Indian Reservation separately, the same to be placed at the Crow Agency and with the Government farmers of each of the districts of the reservation for the information of the Indians affected by section 7 of this act.

SEC. 9. That lands within said reservation, whether allotted, unallotted, or otherwise disposed of, shall be subject to all laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of intoxicating liquors into the Indian country until otherwise provided by Congress.

SEC. 10. That any unallotted lands on the Crow Reservation chiefly valuable for the development of water power shall be reserved from allotment or other disposition hereunder, for the benefit of the Crow Tribe of Indians: Provided, That such lands shall not be leased or otherwise disposed of without the consent of the tribal council.

It shall be the duty of the superintendent of the Crow Reservation to observe closely the manner in which such stock are handled and cared for, and in case of failure or neglect to properly care for the same the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to take charge of such shares and sell them for the benefit of the individual owners, to whose credit the proceeds of the sale shall be placed, or return them to the tribal herd or handle them with tribal cattle for the minor or incompetent owners and charge a fee to cover the cost of caring for them.

SEC. 12. That upon the approval of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall forthwith appoint a commission consisting of three persons to complete the enrollment of the members of the tribe as herein provided for, and to divide them into two classes, competents and incompetents, said commission to be constituted as follows: Two of said commissioners shall be enrolled members of the Crow Indian Tribe and shall be selected by a majority vote of three delegates from each of the districts on the Crow Reservation; and one commissioners shall be a representative of the Department of the Interior, to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior. Said commission shall be governed by regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the classification of the members of the tribe hereunder shall be subject to his approval. That within 30 days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet at some point within the Crow Indian Reservation and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. That said commissioners shall then proceed personally to classify the members as above indicated. They shall be paid a salary of not to exceed $10 per day each, and necessary expenses while actually employed in the work of making this classification, exclusive of subsistence, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, such classification to be completed within six months from the date of organizing the commission.

SEC. 13. And in cases where patents have already been issued for such allotments proper conveyance shall be made back to the United States by the allottee, whereupon the land shall become subject to disposition in the same manner as other lands under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell allotted and inherited Indian land held in trust by the United States on the Crow Reservation, Mont., with the consent of the Indian allottee or the heirs, respectively, to any soldier, seaman, or marine who served under the President of the United States for 90 days during the late war against the Imperial German Government or in any war in which the United States was engaged with a foreign power, or in the Civil War, who will actually settle on said land, on annual payments covering a period not to exceed 20 years, as may be agreed upon under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the said Secretary of the Interior may prescribe and in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 16. That there is hereby granted to the State of Montana for common-school purposes sections 16 and 36, within the territory described herein, or such parts of said sections as may be nonmineral or nontimbered, and for which the said State has not heretofore received indemnity lands under existing laws; and in case either of said sections or parts thereof is lost to the State by reason of allotment or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized to select other unoccupied, unreserved, nonmineral, nontimbered lands within said reservation, not exceeding two sections in any one township. The United States shall pay the Indians for the lands so granted $5 per acre, and sufficient money is hereby appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated to pay for said school lands granted to the said State: Provided, That the mineral rights in said school lands are hereby reserved for the benefit of the Crow Tribe of Indians as herein authorized: Provided further, That the Crow Indian children shall be permitted to attend the public schools of said State on the same condition as the children of white citizens of said State.

SEC. 17. The purchase price of all town lots sold in town sites shall be paid at such time and in such installments as the Secretary of the Interior may direct.

SEC. 18. Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before we proceed to that, Mr. President, I desire to say that in section 11 an error has occurred. The numeral "3" should be "2," so that section 11 will read:

That so much of article 2 of the act of April 27, 1904, entitled—

And so forth.

I move to amend the committee amendment to that effect.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I move to amend the committee amendment—the substitute offered by the committee—by striking out all that part of section 10 after the word "Indian," in line 16 of that page of the printed bill where section 10 of the committee substitute appears. My amendment is to strike out the proviso at the end of the section, which says:

Provided, That such lands shall not be leased or otherwise disposed of without the consent of the tribal council.

That would leave section 10 standing without the proviso and would provide that any unallotted lands of the Crow Reservation, chiefly valuable for the development of water power, be reserved from allotment, or other disposition hereunder, for the benefit of the Crow Tribe of Indians.

I think the disposition of those lands which are held for the benefit of the Crow Tribe of Indians should be vested in the power and discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. The disposition of all Indian lands has always been so vested. The disposition of them is vested in the discretion and power of and put under the control and authority of the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and under existing law. I do not believe that any exception should be made in this case.

Indians occupying a tribal relation are not presumed to be competent to handle their affairs. They are under the guardianship of the Government, and the Secretary of the Interior is their guardian. It is his duty to look after their interests. When it comes to disposing of lands which are valuable for water-power development, I do not believe that their disposition ought to be controlled by a band or tribe of Indians who are not competent to manage their own affairs, who are wards of the Government. I do not believe that they ought to have the power to veto any disposition of those lands and lock up their possibilities forever. I think it is unreasonable. If they are not competent to manage their individual affairs, if they are still in a tribal relation and under the guardianship of the United States Government, I do not think they should be allowed to have a veto on the disposition of lands suitable for water-power development.

I would not be afraid, ordinarily, to leave a matter of that kind to the Indians if they were uninfluenced by others and uninterfered with. But scheming persons, agitators, and others who may have sinister motive may acquire a great deal of influence over Indians and persuade them to oppose any disposition of such lands in any way at all or upon any terms. Interested parties might persuade them to block absolutely a valuable water-power development.

We need water-power development now. It is one of the crying needs of the country. Oil is becoming scarce, coal is becoming scarce, wood is becoming scarce, and it is universally admitted that there is a great and crying need for the development of water power for irrigation and for the creation of electrical power by which to operate railroads and for furnishing power for many purposes.

If there is land that may be valuable for water-power development on an Indian reservation, why take the control of it from the Secretary of the Interior? I think we ought to trust the Secretary of the Interior. I believe all of us would be willing to trust the present Secretary of the Interior to do his duty and to look after the rights of the Indians, and I think we could well trust any man who might be appointed to hold the high and responsible position of Secretary of the Interior to act honestly and judiciously. I believe he would do his duty in matters of this kind.

I look upon this as a dangerous provision, one calculated to block and lock up forever valuable water-power sites.

Now, getting down to this instance, I know, and many others in Montana know, and some Senators here know, I believe, that there is a valuable site for water-power development on this reservation. It has been filed upon and a great deal of work has been done upon it through existing law, under a permit that was issued to the big Horn Canyon Power & Development Co., of which Mr. J. J. Harris, of Hardin, Mont., is the president, and to which he and his associates have devoted ceaseless labor for many years. A good deal has been done under that permit under existing law. To say, if this bill passes, that before those people can go ahead with their work they must get the consent of a tribe of Indians who have not been pronounced competent, who are occupying a tribal relation, I think would be unjust and dangerous. I want all the benefits derived from disposition of such lands to go to the Indians, but I want the Secretary of the Interior, a competent man, to say upon what terms the lands shall be disposed of, if at all. If the Secretary of the Interior should say they shall not be disposed of at all, I would be satisfied.

I understand that the land involved in this undertaking of which I speak, on the Crow Indian Reservation, involves about 1,000 acres of Indian land and about 20,000 acres of public land, and that the whole thereof is absolutely necessary for the development of this much-needed enterprise, an honest, meritorious, bona fide enterprise. It is no speculative scheme at all. I know enough about it to pronounce it an honest, bona fide project. Yet, just because one twenty-first part of it happens to be involved in Indian land, such a provision as we have here would put it in the power of this tribe of Indians to block the whole project, and lock it up, and cause these men to lose all the time and money which they have put into this enterprise.

I understand, too, that if the project should be confined to the 1,000 acres which are on Indian land, it would develop about 40,000 horsepower; whereas if it should cover the entire tract, it would develop over 200,000 horsepower. I think we ought to be careful about handling a matter of this kind.

I believe this is a serious matter and that we are about to do a very great injustice. I contend that the control of the water-power possibilities upon the reservation should be vested in the Secretary of the Interior instead of in the Indians.

Under the water-power bill passed by the House and now pending before the Senate, the control of water-power sites is vested in a commission consisting of the Secretaries of the Interior, Agriculture, and War. Under existing law, the control of water-power upon the public domain, including Indian lands, is under the Secretary of the Interior. The Indians and their welfare also come under his supervision and control.

I submit that undoubtedly my amendments should be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Montana expect that the amendment proposed by him and the bill will be acted upon to-day?

Mr. MYERS. I do not want to block the passage of the bill. I am quite willing to have the bill acted upon whenever the Senate is ready. I merely wanted to get before the Senate my views on my amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator, so far as that is concerned, but really I do not think we ought to dispose of it this afternoon.

Mr. MYERS. That is for the Senate to say.

Mr. SMOOT. It is 2 o'clock now.

"(c) The sums due to the nationals of one of the High Contracting Parties by the nationals of an Opposing State will be debited to the Clearing Office of the country of the debtor, and paid to the creditor by the Clearing Office of the country of the creditor;

"(d) Debts shall be paid or credited in the currency of such one of the Allied and Associated Powers, their colonies or protectorates, or the British Dominions or India, as may be concerned. If the debts are payable in some other currency they shall be paid or credited in the currency of the country concerned, whether an Allied or Associated Power, Colony, Protectorate, British Dominion or India, at the pre-war rate of exchange.

"For the purpose of this provision the pre-war rate of exchange shall be defined as the average cable transfer rate prevailing in the Allied or Associated country concerned during the month immediately preceding the outbreak of war between the said country concerned and Germany.

"If a contract provides for a fixed rate of exchange governing the conversion of the currency in which the debt is stated into the currency of the Allied or Associated country concerned, then the above provisions concerning the rate of exchange shall not apply.

"In the case of new States the currency in which and the rate of exchange at which debts shall be paid or credited shall be determined by the Reparation Commission provided for in Part VIII (Reparation);

"(e) The provisions of this Article and of the Annex hereto shall not apply as between Germany on the one hand and any one of the Allied and Associated Powers, their colonies or protectorates, or any one of the British Dominions or India on the other hand, unless within a period of one month from the deposit of the ratification of the present Treaty by the Power in question, or of the ratification on behalf of such Dominion or of India, notice to that effect is given to Germany by the Government of such Allied or Associated Power or of such Dominion or of India as the case may be;

"(f) The Allied and Associated Powers who have adopted this Article and the Annex hereto may agree between themselves to apply them to their respective nationals established in their territory so far as regards matters between their nationals and German nationals. In this case the payments made by application of this provision will be subject to arrangements between the Allied and Associated Clearing Offices concerned.

"ANNEX.

"1.

"Each of the High Contracting Parties will, within three months from the notification provided for in Article 296, paragraph (c), establish a Clearing Office for the collection and payment of enemy debts.

"Local Clearing Offices may be established for any particular portion of the territories of the High Contracting Parties. Such local Clearing Offices may perform all the functions of a central Clearing Office in their respective districts, except that all transactions with the Clearing Office in the Opposing State must be effected through the central Clearing Office.

"2.

"In this Annex the pecuniary obligations referred to in the first paragraph of Article 296 are described 'as enemy debts,' the persons from whom the same are due as 'enemy debtors,' the persons to whom they are due as 'enemy creditors,' the Clearing Office in the country of the creditor is called the 'Creditor Clearing Office,' and the Clearing Office in the country of the debtor is called the 'Debtor Clearing Office.'

"3.

"The High Contracting Parties will subject contraventions of paragraph (a) of Article 296 to the same penalties as are at present provided by their legislation for trading with the enemy. They will similarly prohibit within their territory all legal process relating to payment of enemy debts, except in accordance with the provisions of this Annex.

"4.

"The Government guarantee specified in paragraph (b) of Article 296 shall take effect whenever, for any reason, a debt shall not be recoverable, except in a case where at the date of the outbreak of war the debt was barred by the laws of prescription in force in the country of the debtor, or where the debtor was at that time in a state of bankruptcy or failure or had given formal indication of insolvency, or where the debt was due by a company whose business has been liquidated under emergency legislation during the war. In such case the procedure specified by this Annex shall apply to payment of the dividends.

"The terms 'bankruptcy' and 'failure' refer to the application of legislation providing for such juridical conditions. The expression 'formal indication of insolvency' bears the same meaning as it has in English law.

"5.

"Creditors shall give notice to the Creditor Clearing Office within six months of its establishment of debts due to them, and shall furnish the Clearing Office with any documents and information required of them.

"The High Contracting Parties will take all suitable measures to trace and punish collusion between enemy creditors and debtors. The Clearing Offices will communicate to one another any evidence and information which might help the discovery and punishment of such collusion.

"The High Contracting Parties will facilitate as much as possible postal and telegraphic communication at the expense of the parties concerned and through the intervention of the Clearing Offices between debtors and creditors desirous of coming to an agreement as to the amount of their debt.

"The Creditor Clearing Office will notify the Debtor Clearing Office of all debts declared to it. The Debtor Clearing Office will, in due course, inform the Creditor Clearing Office which debts are admitted and which debts are contested. In the latter case, the Debtor Clearing Office will give the grounds for the non-admission of debt.

"6.

"When a debt has been admitted, in whole or in part, the Debtor Clearing Office will at once credit the Creditor Clearing Office with the amount admitted, and at the same time notify it of such credit.

"7.

"The debt shall be deemed to be admitted in full and shall be credited forthwith to the Creditor Clearing Office unless within three months from the receipt of the notification or such longer time as may be agreed to by the Creditor Clearing Office notice has been given by the Debtor Clearing Office that it is not admitted.

"8.

"When the whole or part of a debt is not admitted the two Clearing Offices will examine into the matter jointly and will endeavour to bring the parties to an agreement.

"9.

"The Creditor Clearing Office will pay to the individual creditor the sums credited to it out of the funds placed at its disposal by the Government of its country and in accordance with the conditions fixed by the said Government, retaining any sums considered necessary to cover risks, expenses or commissions.

"10.

"Any person having claimed payment of an enemy debt which is not admitted in whole or in part shall pay to the clearing office, by way of fine, interest at 5 per cent. on the part not admitted. Any person having unduly refused to admit the whole or part of a debt claimed from him shall pay, by way of fine, interest at 5 per cent. on the amount with regard to which his refusal shall be disallowed.

"Such interest shall run from the date of expiration of the period provided for in paragraph 7 until the date on which the claim shall have been disallowed or the debt paid.

"Each Clearing Office shall in so far as it is concerned take steps to collect the fines above provided for, and will be responsible if such fines cannot be collected.

"The fines will be credited to the other Clearing Office, which shall retain them as a contribution towards the cost of carrying out the present provisions.

"11.

"The balance between the Clearing Offices shall be struck monthly and the credit balance paid in cash by the debtor State within a week.

"Nevertheless, any credit balances which may be due by one or more of the Allied and Associated Powers shall be retained until complete payment shall have been effected of the sums due to the Allied or Associated Powers or their nationals on account of the war.

"12.

"To facilitate discussion between the Clearing Offices each of them shall have a representative at the place where the other is established.

"13.

"Except for special reasons all discussions in regard to claims will, so far as possible, take place at the Debtor Clearing Office.

"14.

"In conformity with Article 296, paragraph (b), the High Contracting Parties are responsible for the payment of the enemy debts owing by their nationals.

"The Debtor Clearing Office will therefore credit the Creditor Clearing Office with all debts admitted, even in case of inability to collect them from the individual debtor. The Governments concerned will, nevertheless, invest their respective Clearing Offices with all necessary powers for the recovery of debts which have been admitted.

"As an exception, the admitted debts owing by persons having suffered injury from acts of war shall only be credited to the Creditor Clearing Office when the compensation due to the person concerned in respect of such injury shall have been paid.

"15.

"Each Government will defray the expenses of the Clearing Office set up in its territory, including the salaries of the staff.

"16.

"Where the two Clearing Offices are unable to agree whether a debt claimed is due, or in case of a difference between an enemy debtor and an enemy creditor or between the Clearing Offices, the dispute shall either be referred to arbitration if the parties so agree under conditions fixed by agreement between them, or referred to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI hereafter.

"At the request of the Creditor Clearing Office the dispute may, however, be submitted to the jurisdiction of the Courts of the place of domicile of the debtor.

"17.

"Recovery of sums found by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, the Court, or the Arbitration Tribunal to be due shall be effected through the Clearing Offices as if these sums were debts admitted by the Debtor Clearing Office.

"18.

"Each of the Governments concerned shall appoint an agent who will be responsible for the presentation to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal of the cases conducted on behalf of its Clearing Office. This agent will exercise a general control over the representatives or counsel employed by its nationals.

"Decisions will be arrived at on documentary evidence, but it will be open to the Tribunal to hear the parties in person, or according to their preference by their representatives approved by the two Governments, or by the agent referred to above, who shall be competent to intervene along with the party or to reopen and maintain a claim abandoned by the same.

"19.

"The Clearing Offices concerned will lay before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal all the information and documents in their possession, so as to enable the Tribunal to decide rapidly on the cases which are brought before it.

"20.

"Where one of the parties concerned appeals against the joint decision of the two Clearing Offices he shall make a deposit against the costs, which deposit shall only be refunded when the first judgment is modified in favour of the appellant and in proportion to the success he may attain, his opponent in case of such a refund being required to pay an equivalent proportion of the costs and expenses. Security accepted by the Tribunal may be substituted for a deposit.

"A fee of 5 per cent. of the amount in dispute shall be charged in respect of all cases brought before the Tribunal. This fee shall, unless the Tribunal directs otherwise, be borne by the unsuccessful party. Such fee shall be added to the deposit referred to. It is also independent of the security.

"The Tribunal may award to one of the parties a sum in respect of the expenses of the proceedings.

"Any sum payable under this paragraph shall be credited to the Clearing Office of the successful party as a separate item.

"21.

"With a view to the rapid settlement of claims, due regard shall be paid in the appointment of all persons connected with the Clearing Offices or with the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal to their knowledge of the language of the other country concerned.

"Each of the Clearing Offices will be at liberty to correspond with the other and to forward documents in its own language.

"22.

"Subject to any special agreement to the contrary between the Governments concerned, debts shall carry interest in accordance with the following provisions:

"Interest shall not be payable on sums of money due by way of dividend, interest or other periodical payments which themselves represent interest on capital.

"The rate of interest shall be 5 per cent. per annum except in cases where, by contract, law or custom, the creditor is entitled to payment of interest at a different rate. In such cases the rate to which he is entitled shall prevail.

"Interest shall run from the date of commencement of hostilities (or, if the sum of money to be recovered fell due during the war, from the date at which it fell due) until the sum is credited to the Clearing Office of the creditor.

"Sums due by way of interest shall be treated as debts admitted by the Clearing Offices and shall be credited to the Creditor Clearing Office in the same way as such debts.

"23.

"Where by decision of the Clearing Offices or the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal a claim is held not to fall within Article 296, the creditor shall be at liberty to prosecute the claim before the Courts or to take such other proceedings as may be open to him.

"The presentation of a claim to the Clearing Office suspends the operation of any period of prescription.

"24.

"The High Contracting Parties agree to regard the decisions of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal as final and conclusive, and to render them binding upon their nationals.

"25.

"In any case where a Creditor Clearing Office declines to notify a claim to the Debtor Clearing Office, or to take any step provided for in this Annex, intended to make effective in whole or in part a request of which it has received due notice, the enemy creditor shall be entitled to receive from the Clearing Office a certificate setting out the amount of the claim, and shall then be entitled to prosecute the claim before the courts or to take such other proceedings as may be open to him.

"Section IV.

"PROPERTY, RIGHTS AND INTERESTS.

"Article 297.

"The question of private property, rights and interests in an enemy country shall be settled according to the principles laid down in this Section and to the provisions of the Annex hereto.

"(a) The exceptional war measures and measures of transfer (defined in paragraph 3 of the Annex hereto) taken by Germany with respect to the property, rights and interests of nationals of Allied or Associated Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, when liquidation has not been completed, shall be immediately discontinued or stayed and the property, rights and interests concerned restored to their owners, who shall enjoy full rights therein in accordance with the provisions of Article 298.

"(b) Subject to any contrary stipulations which may be provided for in the present Treaty, the Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions and protectorates, including territories ceded to them by the present Treaty.

"The liquidation shall be carried out in accordance with the laws of the Allied or Associated State concerned, and the German owner shall not be able to dispose of such property, rights or interests nor to subject them to any charge without the consent of that State.

"German nationals who acquire ipso facto the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power in accordance with the provisions of the present Treaty will not be considered as German nationals within the meaning of this paragraph.

"(c) The price or the amount of compensation in respect of the exercise of the right referred to in the preceding paragraph (b) will be fixed in accordance with the methods of sale or valuation adopted by the laws of the country in which the property has been retained or liquidated.

"(d) As between the Allied and Associated Powers or their nationals on the one hand and Germany or her nationals on the other hand, all the exceptional war measures, or measures of transfer, or acts done or to be done in execution of such measures as defined in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex hereto shall be considered as final and binding upon all persons except as regards the reservations laid down in the present Treaty.

"(e) The nationals of Allied and Associated Powers shall be entitled to compensation in respect of damage or injury inflicted upon their property, rights, or interests, including any company or association in which they are interested, in German territory as it existed on August 1, 1914, by the application either of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex hereto. The claims made in this respect by such nationals shall be investigated, and the total of the compensation shall be determined by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI or by an Arbitrator appointed by that Tribunal. This compensation shall be borne by Germany, and may be charged upon the property of German nationals within the territory or under the control of the claimant's State. This property may be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the conditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. The payment of this compensation may be made by the Allied or Associated State, and the amount will be debited to Germany.

"(f) Whenever a national of an Allied or Associated Power is entitled to property which has been subjected to a measure of transfer in German territory and expresses a desire for its restitution, his claim for compensation in accordance with paragraph (c) shall be satisfied by the restitution of the said property if it still exists in specie.

"In such case Germany shall take all necessary steps to restore the evicted owner to the possession of his property, free from all encumbrances or burdens with which it may have been charged after the liquidation, and to indemnify all third parties injured by the restitution .

"If the restitution provided for in this paragraph cannot be effected, private agreements arranged by the intermediation of the Powers concerned or the Clearing Offices provided for in the Annex to Secton III may be made, in order to secure that the national of the Allied or Associated Power may secure compensation for the injury referred to in paragraph (e) by the grant of advantages or equivalents which he agrees to accept in place of the property, rights or interests of which he was deprived.

"Through restitution in accordance with this Article, the price or the amount of compensation fixed by the application of paragraph (e) will be reduced by the actual value of the property restored, account being taken of compensation in respect of loss of use or deterioration.

"(g) The rights conferred by paragraph (f) are reserved to owners who are nationals of Allied or Associated Powers within whose territory legislative measures prescribing the general liquidation of enemy property, rights or interests were not applied before the signature of the Armistice.

"(h) Except in cases where, by application of paragraph (f), restitutions in specie have been made, the net proceeds of sales of enemy property, rights or interests wherever situated carried out either by virtue of war legislation, or by application of this Article, and in general all cash assets of enemies, shall be dealt with as follows:

"(1) As regards Powers adopting Section III and the Annex thereto, the said proceeds and cash assets shall be credited to the Power of which the owner is a national, through the Clearing Office established thereunder; any credit balance in favour of Germany resulting therefrom shall be dealt with as provided in Article 243.

"(2) As regards Powers not adopting Section III and the Annex thereto, the proceeds of the property, rights and interests, and the cash assets, of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers held by Germany shall be paid immediately to the person entitled thereto or to his Government; the proceeds of the property, rights and interests, and the cash assets, of German nationals received by an Allied or Associated Power shall be subject to disposal by such Power in accordance with its laws and regulations and may be applied in payment of the claims and debts defined by this Article or paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. Any property, rights and interests or proceeds thereof or cash assets not used as above provided may be retained by the said Allied or Associated Power and if retained the cash value thereof shall be dealt with as provided in Article 243.

"In the case of liquidations effected in new States, which are signatories of the present Treaty as Allied and Associated Powers, or in States which are not entitled to share in the reparation payments to be made by Germany, the proceeds of liquidations effected by such States shall, subject to the rights of the Reparation Commission under the present Treaty, particularly under Articles 235 and 260, be paid direct to the owner. If on the application of that owner, the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, provided for by Section VI of this Part, or an arbitrator appointed by that Tribunal, is satisfied that the conditions of the sale or measures taken by the Government of the State in question outside its general legislation were unfairly prejudicial to the price obtained, they shall have discretion to award to the owner equitable compensation to be paid by that State.

"(i) Germany undertakes to compensate her nationals in respect of the sale or retention of their property, rights or interests in Allied or Associated States.

"(j) The amount of all taxes and imposts upon capital levied or to be levied by Germany on the property, rights and interests of the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers from November 11, 1918, until three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, or, in the case of property, rights or interests which have been subjected to exceptional measures of war, until restitution in accordance with the present Treaty, shall be restored to the owners.

"Article 298.

"Germany undertakes, with regard to the property, rights and interests, including companies and associations in which they were interested, restored to nationals of Allied and Associated Powers in accordance with the provisions of Article 297, paragraph (a) or (f):

"(a) to restore and maintain, except as expressly provided in the present Treaty, the property, rights and interests of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers in the legal position obtaining in respect of the property, rights and interests of German nationals under the laws in force before the war;

"(b) not to subject the property, rights or interests of the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers to any measures in derogation of property rights which are not applied equally to the property, rights and interests of German nationals, and to pay adequate compensation in the event of the application of these measures.

"ANNEX.

"In accordance with the provisions of Article 297, paragraph (d), the validity of vesting orders and of orders for the winding up of businesses or companies, and of any other orders, directions, decisions or instructions of any court or any department of the Government of any of the High Contracting Parties made or given, or purporting to be made or given, in pursuance of war legislation with regard to enemy property, rights and interests is confirmed. The interests of all persons shall be regarded as having been effectively dealt with by any order, direction, decision or instruction dealing with property in which they may be interested, whether or not such interests are specifically mentioned in the order, direction, decision, or instruction. No question shall be raised as to the regularity of a transfer of any property, rights or interests dealt with in pursuance of any such order, direction, decision or instruction. Every action taken with regard to any property, business, or company, whether as regards its investigation, sequestration, compulsory administration, use, requisition, supervision, or winding up, the sale or management of property, rights or interests, the collection or discharge of debts, the payment of costs, charges or expenses, or any other matter whatsoever, in pursuance of orders, directions, decisions, or instructions of any court or of any department of the Government of any of the High Contracting Parties, made or given, or purporting to be made or given, in pursuance of war legislation with regard to enemy property, rights or interests, is confirmed. Provided that the provisions of this paragraph shall not be held to prejudice the titles to property heretofore acquired in good faith and for value and in accordance with the laws of the country in which the property is situated by nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers.

"The provisions of this paragraph do not apply to such of the above-mentioned measures as have been taken by the German authorities in invaded or occupied territory, nor to such of the above mentioned measures as have been taken by Germany or the German authorities since November 11, 1918, all of which shall be void.

"2.

"No claim or action shall be made or brought against any Allied or Associated Power or against any person acting on behalf of or under the direction of any legal authority or Department of the Government of such a Power by Germany or by any German national wherever resident in respect of any act or omission with regard to his property, rights or interests during the war or in preparation for the war. Similarly no claim or action shall be made or brought against any person in respect of any act or omission under or in accordance with the exceptional war measures, laws or regulations of any Allied or Associated Power.

"3.

"In Article 297 and this Annex the expression "exceptional war measures" includes measures of all kinds, legislative, administrative, judicial or others, that have been taken or will be taken hereafter with regard to enemy property, and which have had or will have the effect of removing from the proprietors the power of disposition over their property, though without affecting the ownership, such as measures of supervision, of compulsory administration, and of sequestration; or measures which have had or will have as an object the seizure of, the use of, or the interference with enemy assets, for whatsoever motive, under whatsoever form or in whatsoever place. Acts in the execution of these measures include all detentions, instructions, orders or decrees of Government departments or courts applying these measures to enemy property, as well as acts performed by any person connected with the administration or the supervision of enemy property, such as the payment of debts, the collecting of credits, the payment of any costs, charges or expenses, or the collecting of fees.

"Measures of transfer are those which have affected or will affect the ownership of enemy property by transferring it in whole or in part to a person other than the enemy owner, and without his consent, such as measures directing the sale, liquidation, or devolution of ownership in enemy property, or the cancelling of titles or securities.

"4.

"All property, rights and interests of German nationals within the territory of any Allied or Associated Power and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation or other dealing therewith may be charged by that Allied or Associated Power in the first place with payment of amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of that Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights and interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested, in German territory, or debts owing to them by German nationals, and with payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government or by any German authorities since July 31, 1914, and before that Allied or Associated Power entered into the war. The amount of such claims may be assessed by an arbitrator appointed by Mr. Gustave Ador, if he is willing, or if no such appointment is made by him, by an arbitrator appointed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI. They may be charged in the second place with payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of such Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights and interests in the territory of other enemy Powers, in so far as those claims are otherwise unsatisfied.

"5.

"Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 297, where immediately before the outbreak of war a company incorporated in an Allied or Associated State had rights in common with a company controlled by it and incorporated in Germany to the use of trade-marks in third countries, or enjoyed the use in common with such company of unique means of reproduction of goods or articles for sale in third countries, the former company shall alone have the right to use these trade-marks in third countries to the exclusion of the German company, and these unique means of reproduction shall be handed over to the former company, notwithstanding any action taken under German war legislation with regard to the latter company or its business, industrial property or shares. Nevertheless, the former company, if requested, shall deliver the latter company derivative copies permitting the continuation of reproduction of articles for use within German territory.

"6.

"Up to the time when restitution is carried out in accordance with Article 297, Germany is responsible for the conservation of property, rights and interests of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, that have been subjected by her to exceptional war measures.

"7.

"Within one year from the coming into force of the present Treaty the Allied or Associated Powers will specify the property, rights and interests over which they intend to exercise the right provided in Article 297, paragraph (f).

"8.

"The restitution provided in Article 297 will be carried out by order of the German Government or of the authorities which have been substituted for it. Detailed accounts of the action of administrators shall be furnished to the interested persons by the German authorities upon request, which may be made at any time after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"9.

"Until completion of the liquidation provided for by Article 297, paragraph (b), the property, rights and interests of German nationals will continue to be subject to exceptional war measures that have been or will be taken with regard to them.

"10.

"Germany will, within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, deliver to each Allied or Associated Power all securities, certificates, deeds, or other documents of title held by its nationals and relating to property, rights or interests situated in the territory of that Allied or Associated Power, including any shares, stock, debentures, debenture stock, or other obligations of any company incorporated in accordance with the laws of that Power.

"Germany will at any time on demand of any Allied or Associated Power furnish such information as may be required with regard to the property, rights and interests of German nationals within the territory of such Allied or Associated Power, or with regard to any transactions concerning such property, rights or interests effected since July 1, 1914.

"11.

"The expression 'cash assets' includes all deposits or funds established before or after the declaration of war, as well as all assets coming from deposits, revenues, or profits collected by administrators, sequestrators, or others from funds placed on deposit or otherwise, but does not include sums belonging to the Allied or Associated Powers or to their component States, Provinces, or Municipalities.

"12.

"All investments wheresoever effected with the cash assets of nationals of the High Contracting Parties, including companies and associations in which such nationals were interested, by persons responsible for the administration of enemy properties or having control over such administration, or by order of such persons or of any authority whatsoever shall be annulled. These cash assets shall be accounted for irrespective of any such investment.

"13.

"Within one month from the coming into force of the present Treaty, or on demand at any time, Germany will deliver to the Allied and Associated Powers all accounts, vouchers, records, documents and information of any kind which may be within German territory, and which concern the property, rights and interests of the nationals of those Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, that have been subjected to an exceptional war measure, or to a measure of transfer either in German territory or in territory occupied by Germany or her allies.

"The controllers, supervisors, managers, administrators, sequestrators, liquidators and receivers shall be personally responsible under guarantee of the German Government for the immediate delivery in full of these accounts and documents, and for their accuracy.

"14.

"The provisions of Article 297 and this Annex relating to property, rights and interests in an enemy county, and the proceeds of the liquidation thereof, apply to debts, credits and accounts, Section III regulating only the method of payment.

"In the settlement of matters provided for in Article 297 between Germany and the Allied or Associated States, their colonies or protectorates, or any one of the British Dominions or India, in respect of any of which a declaration shall not have been made that they adopt Section III, and between their respective nationals, the provisions of Section III respecting the currency in which payment is to be made and the rate of exchange and of interest shall apply unless the Government of the Allied or Associated Power concerned shall within six months of the coming into force of the present Treaty notify Germany that the said provisions are not to be applied.

"15.

"The provisions of Article 297 and this Annex apply to industrial, literary and artistic property which has been or will be dealt with in the liquidation of property, rights, interests, companies or businesses under war legislation by the Allied or Associated Powers, or in accordance with the stipulations of Article 297, paragraph (b).

"Section V.

"CONTRACTS, PRESCRIPTIONS, JUDGMENTS.

"Article 299.

"(a) Any contract concluded between enemies shall be regarded as having been dissolved as from the time when any two of the parties became enemies, except in respect of any debt or other pecuniary obligation arising out of any act done or money paid thereunder, and subject to the exceptions and special rules with regard to particular contracts or classes of contracts contained herein or in the Annex hereto.

"(b) Any contract of which the execution shall be required in the general interest, within six months from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, by the Allied or Associated Governments of which one of the parties is a national, shall be excepted from dissolution under this Article.

"When the execution of the contract thus kept alive would, owing to the alteration of trade conditions, cause one of the parties substantial prejudice the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for by Section VI shall be empowered to grant to the prejudiced party equitable compensation.

"(c) Having regard to the provisions of the constitution and law of the United States of America, of Brazil, and of Japan, neither the present Article, nor Article 300, nor the Annex hereto shall apply to contracts made between nationals of these States and German nationals; nor shall Article 305 apply to the United States of America or its nationals.

"(d) The present Article and the annex hereto shall not apply to contracts the parties to which became enemies by reason of one of them being an inhabitant of territory of which the sovereignty has been transferred, if such party shall acquire under the present Treaty the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power, nor shall they apply to contracts between nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers between whom trading has been prohibited by reason of one of the parties being in Allied or Associated territory in the occupation of the enemy.

"(e) Nothing in the present Article or the annex hereto shall be deemed to invalidate a transaction lawfully carried out in accordance with a contract between enemies if it has been carried out with the authority of one of the belligerent Powers.

"Article 300.

"(a) All periods of prescription, or limitation of right of action, whether they began to run before or after the outbreak of war, shall be treated in the territory of the High Contracting Parties, so far as regards relations between enemies, as having been suspended for the duration of the war. They shall begin to run again at earliest three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty. This provision shall apply to the period prescribed for the presentation of interest or dividend coupons or for the presentation for repayment of securities drawn for repayment or repayable on any other ground.

"(b) Where, on account of failure to perform any act or comply with any formality during the war, measures of execution have been taken in German territory to the prejudice of a national of an Allied or Associated Power, the claim of such national shall, if the matter does not fall within the competence of the Courts of an Allied or Associated Power, be heard by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for by Section VI.

"(c) Upon the application of any interested person who is a national of an Allied or Associated Power the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall order the restoration of the rights which have been prejudiced by the measures of execution referred to in paragraph (b), wherever, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, such restoration is equitable and possible.

"If such restoration is inequitable or impossible the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal may grant compensation to the prejudiced party to be paid by the German Government.

"(d) Where a contract between enemies has been dissolved by reason either of failure on the part of either party to carry out its provision or of the exercise of a right stipulated in the contract itself the party prejudiced may apply to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal for relief. The Tribunal will have the powers provided for in paragraph (c).

"(e) The provisions of the preceding paragraphs of this Article shall apply to the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers who have been prejudiced by reason of measures referred to above taken by Germany in invaded or occupied territory, if they have not been otherwise compensated.

"(f) Germany shall compensate any third party who may be prejudiced by any restitution or restoration ordered by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal under the provisions of the preceding paragraphs of this Article.

"(g) As regards negotiable instruments, the period of three months provided under paragraph (a) shall commence as from the date on which any exceptional regulations applied in the territories of the interested Power with regard to negotiable instruments shall have definitely ceased to have force.

"Article 301.

"As between enemies no negotiable instrument made before the war shall be deemed to have become invalid by reason only of failure within the required time to present the instrument for acceptance or payment or to give notice of non-acceptance or non-payment to drawers or indorsers or to protest the instrument, nor by reason of failure to complete any formality during the war.

"Where the period within which a negotiable instrument should have been presented for acceptance or for payment, or within which notice of non-acceptance or non-payment should have been given to the drawer or indorser, or within which the instrument should have been protested, has elapsed during the war, and the party who should have presented or protested the instrument or have given notice of non-acceptance or non-payment has failed to do so during the war, a period of not less than three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty shall be allowed within which presentation, notice of non-acceptance or non-payment or protest may be made.

"Article 302.

"Judgments given by the Courts of an Allied or Associated Power in all cases which, under the present Treaty, they are competent to decide, shall be recognised in Germany as final, and shall be enforced without it being necessary to have them declared executory.

"If a judgment in respect to any dispute which may have arisen has been given during the war by a German Court against a national of an Allied or Associated State in a case in which he was not able to make his defence, the Allied and Associated national who has suffered prejudice thereby shall be entitled to recover compensation, to be fixed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI.

"At the instance of the national of the Allied or Associated Power the compensation above-mentioned may, upon order to that effect of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, be effected where it is possible by replacing the parties in the situation which they occupied before the judgment was given by the German Court.

"The above compensation may likewise be obtained before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal by the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers who have suffered prejudice by judicial measures taken in invaded or occupied territories, if they have not been otherwise compensated.

"Article 303.

"For the purpose of Sections III, IV, V and VII, the expression 'during the war' means for each Allied or Associated Power the period between the commencement of the state of war between that Power and Germany and the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"ANNEX.

"I. General Provisions.

"1.

"Within the meaning of Articles 290, 300 and 301, the parties to a contract shall be regarded as enemies when trading between them shall have been prohibited by or otherwise became unlawful under laws, orders or regulations to which one of those parties was subject. They shall be deemed to have become enemies from the date when such trading was prohibited or otherwise became unlawful.

"2.

"The following classes of contracts are excepted from dissolution by Article 299 and, without prejudice to the rights contained in Article 297 (b) of Section IV, remain in force subject to the application of domestic laws, orders or regulations made during the war by the Allied and Associated Powers and subject to the terms of the contracts:

"(a) Contracts having for their object the transfer of estates or of real or personal property where the property therein had passed or the object had been delivered before the parties became enemies;

"(b) Leases and agreements for leases of land and houses;
"(c) Contracts of mortgage, pledge or lien;
"(d) Concessions concerning mines, quarries or deposits;
"(e) Contracts between individuals or companies and States, provinces, municipalities, or other similar juridical persons charged with administrative functions, and concessions granted by States, provinces, municipalities, or other similar juridical persons charged with administrative functions.

"3.

"If the provisions of a contract are in part dissolved under Article 299, the remaining provisions of that contract shall, subject to the same application of domestic laws as is provided for in paragraph 2, continue in force if they are severable, but where they are not severable the contract shall be deemed to have been dissolved in its entirety.

"II. Provisions relating to certain classes of Contracts.

"STOCK EXCHANGE AND COMMERCIAL EXCHANGE CONTRACTS.

"4.

"(a) Rules made during the war by any recognised Exchange or Commercial Association providing for the closure of contracts entered into before the war by an enemy are confirmed by the High Contracting Parties, as also any action taken thereunder, provided:

"(1) That the contract was expressed to be made subject to the rules of the Exchange or Association in question;
"(2) That the rules applied to all persons concerned;
"(3) That the conditions attaching to the closure were fair and reasonable.

"(b) The preceding paragraph shall not apply to rules made during the occupation by Exchanges or Commercial Associations in the districts occupied by the enemy.

"(c) The closure of contracts relating to cotton 'futures,' which were closed as on July 31, 1914, under the decision of the Liverpool Cotton Association, is also confirmed.

"SECURITY.

"5.

"The sale of a security held for an unpaid debt owing by an enemy shall be deemed to have been valid irrespective of notice to the owner if the creditor acted in good faith and with reasonable care and prudence, and no claim by the debtor on the ground of such sale shall be admitted.

"This stipulation shall not apply to any sale of securities effected by an enemy during the occupation in regions invaded or occupied by the enemy.

"NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

"6.

"As regards Powers which adopt Section III and the Annex thereto the pecuniary obligations existing between enemies and resulting from the issue of negotiable instruments shall be adjusted in conformity with the said Annex by the instrumentality of the Clearing Offices, which shall assume the rights of the holder as regards the various remedies open to him.

"7.

"If a person has either before or during the war become liable upon a negotiable instrument in accordance with an undertaking given to him by a person who has subsequently become an enemy, the latter shall remain liable to indemnify the former in respect of his liability notwithstanding the outbreak of war.

"III. Contracts of insurance.

"8.

"Contracts of insurance entered into by any person with another person who subsequently became an enemy will be dealt with in accordance with the following paragraphs.

"FIRE INSURANCE.

"9.

"Contracts for the insurance of property against fire entered into by a person interested in such property with another person who subsequently became an enemy shall not be deemed to have been dissolved by the outbreak of war, or by the fact of the person becoming an enemy, or on account of the failure during the war and for a period of three months thereafter to perform his obligations under the contract, but they shall be dissolved at the date when the annual premium becomes payable for the first time after the expiration of a period of three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"A settlement shall be effected of unpaid premiums which became due during the war, or of claims for losses which occurred during the war.

"10.

"Where by administrative or legislative action an insurance against fire effected before the war has been transferred during the war from the original to another insurer, the transfer will be recognised and the liability of the original insurer will be deemed to have ceased as from the date of the transfer. The original insurer will, however, be entitled to receive on demand full information as to the terms of the transfer, and if it should appear that these terms were not equitable they shall be amended so far as may be necessary to render them equitable.

"Furthermore, the insured shall, subject to the concurrence of the original insurer, be entitled to retransfer the contract to the original insurer as from the date of the demand.

"LIFE INSURANCE.

"11.

"Contracts of life insurance entered into between an insurer and a person who subsequently became an enemy shall not be deemed to have been dissolved by the outbreak of war, or by the fact of the person becoming an enemy.

"Any sum which during the war became due upon a contract deemed not to have been dissolved under the preceding provision shall be recoverable after the war with the addition of interest at five per cent. per annum from the date of its becoming due up to the day of payment.

"Where the contract has lapsed during the war owing to non-payment of premiums, or has become void from breach of the conditions of the contract, the assured or his representatives or the person entitled shall have the right at any time within twelve months of the coming into force of the present Treaty to claim from the insurer the surrender value of the policy at the date of its lapse or avoidance.

"Where the contract has lapsed during the war owing to non-payment of premiums the payment of which has been prevented by the enforcement of measures of war, the assured or his representative or the persons entitled shall have the right to restore the contract on payment of the premiums with interest at five per cent. per annum within three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"12.

"Any Allied or Associated Power may within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty cancel all the contracts of insurance running between a German insurance company and its nationals under conditions which shall protect its nationals from any prejudice.

"To this end the German insurance company will hand over to the Allied or Associated Government concerned the proportion of its assets attributable to the policies so cancelled and will be relieved from all liability in respect of such policies. The assets to be handed over shall be determined by an actuary appointed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal.

"Where contracts of life insurance have been entered into by a local branch of an insurance company established in a country which subsequently became an enemy country, the contract shall, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary in the contract itself, be governed by the local law, but the insurer shall be entitled to demand from the insured or his representatives the refund of sums paid on claims made or enforced under measures taken during the war, if the making or enforcement of such claims was not in accordance with the terms of the contract itself or was not consistent with the laws or treaties existing at the time when it was entered into.

"14.

"In any case where by the law applicable to the contract the insurer remains bound by the contract notwithstanding the non-payment of premiums until notice is given to the insured of the termination of the contract, he shall be entitled where the giving of such notice was prevented by the war to recover the unpaid premiums with interest at five per cent. per annum from the insured.

"15.

"Insurance contracts shall be considered as contracts of life assurance for the purpose of paragraphs 11 to 14 when they depend on the probabilities of human life combined with the rate of interest for the calculation of the reciprocal engagements between the two parties.

"MARINE INSURANCE.

"16.

"Contracts of marine insurance including time policies and voyage policies entered into between an insurer and a person who subsequently became an enemy, shall be deemed to have been dissolved on his becoming an enemy, except in cases where the risk undertaken in the contract had attached before he became an enemy.

"Where the risk had not attached, money paid by way of premium or otherwise shall be recoverable from the insurer.

"Where the risk had attached effect shall be given to the contract notwithstanding the party becoming an enemy, and sums due under the contract either by way of premiums or in respect of losses shall be recoverable after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"In the event of any agreement being come to for the payment of interest on sums due before the war to or by the nationals of States which have been at war and recovered after the war, such interest shall in the case of losses recoverable under contracts of marine insurance run from the expiration of a period of one year from the date of the loss.

"No contract of marine insurance with an insured person who subsequently became an enemy shall be deemed to cover losses due to belligerent action by the Power of which the insurer was a national or by the allies or associates of such Power.

"18.

"Where it is shown that a person who had before the war entered into a contract of marine insurance with an insurer who subsequently became an enemy entered after the outbreak of war into a new contract covering the same risk with an insurer who was not an enemy, the new contract shall be deemed to be substituted for the original contract as from the date when it was entered into, and the premiums payable shall be adjusted on the basis of the original insurer having remained liable on the contract only up till the time when the new contract was entered into.

"OTHER INSURANCES.

"19.

"Contracts of insurance entered into before the war between an insurer and a person who subsequently became an enemy, other than contracts dealt with in paragraphs 9 to 18, shall be treated in all respects on the same footing as contracts of fire insurance between the same persons would be dealt with under the said paragraphs.

"RE-INSURANCE.

"20.

"All treaties of re-insurance with a person who became an enemy shall be regarded as having been abrogated by the person becoming an enemy, but without prejudice in the case of life or marine risks which had attached before the war to the right to recover payment after the war for sums due in respect of such risks.

"Nevertheless if, owing to invasion, it has been impossible for the re-insured to find another re-insurer, the treaty shall remain in force until three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"Where a re-insurance treaty becomes void under this paragraph, there shall be an adjustment of accounts between the parties in respect both of premiums paid and payable and of liabilities for losses in respect of life or marine risks which had attached before the war. In the case of risks other than those mentioned in paragraphs 11 to 18 the adjustment of accounts shall be made as at the date of the parties becoming enemies without regard to claims for losses which may have occurred since that date.

"The provisions of the preceding paragraph will extend equally to re-insurances existing at the date of the parties becoming enemies of particular risks undertaken by the insurer in a contract of insurance against any risks other than life or marine risks.

"22.

"Re-insurance of life risks effected by particular contracts and not under any general treaty remain in force.

"The provisions of paragraph 12 apply to treaties of re-insurance of life insurance contracts in which enemy companies are the re-insurers.

"23.

"In case of a re-insurance effected before the war of a contract of marine insurance, the cession of a risk which had been ceded to the re-insurer shall, if it had attached before the outbreak of war, remain valid and effect be given to the contract notwithstanding the outbreak of war; sums due under the contract of re-insurance in respect either of premiums or of losses shall be recoverable after the war.

"24.

"The provisions of paragraphs 17 and 18 and the last part of paragraph 16 shall apply to contracts for the re-insurance of marine risks.

"Section VI.

"MIXED ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL.

"Article 304.

"(a) Within three months from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, a Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall be established between each of the Allied and Associated Powers on the one hand and Germany on the other hand. Each such Tribunal shall consist of three members. Each of the Governments concerned shall appoint one of these members. The President shall be chosen by agreement between the two Governments concerned.

"In case of failure to reach agreement, the President of the Tribunal and two other persons either of whom may in case of need take his place, shall be chosen by the Council of the League of Nations, or, until this is set up, by M. Gustave Ador if he is willing. These persons shall be nationals of Powers that have remained neutral during the war.

"If any Government does not proceed within a period of one month in case there is a vacancy to appoint a member of the Tribunal, such member shall be chosen by the other Government from the two persons mentioned above other than the President.

"The decision of the majority of the members of the Tribunal shall be the decision of the Tribunal.

"(b) The Mixed Arbitral Tribunals established pursuant to paragraph (a), shall decide all questions within their competence under Sections III, IV, V and VII.

"In addition, all questions, whatsoever their nature, relating to contracts concluded before the coming into force of the present Treaty between nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers and German nationals shall be decided by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, always excepting questions which, under the laws of the Allied, Associated or Neutral Powers, are within the jurisdiction of the National Courts of those Powers. Such questions shall be decided by the National Courts in question, to the exclusion of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. The party who is a national of an Allied or Associated Power may nevertheless bring the case before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal if this is not prohibited by the laws of his country.

"(c) If the number of cases justifies it, additional members shall be appointed and each Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall sit in divisions. Each of these divisions will be constituted as above.

"(d) Each Mixed Arbitral Tribunal will settle its own procedure except in so far as it is provided in the following Annex, and is empowered to award the sums to be paid by the loser in respect of the costs and expenses of the proceedings.

"(e) Each Government will pay the remuneration of the member of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal appointed by it and of any agent whom it may appoint to represent it before the Tribunal. The remuneration of the President will be determined by special agreement between the Governments concerned; and this remuneration and the joint expenses of each Tribunal will be paid by the two Governments in equal moieties.

"(f) The High Contracting Parties agree that their courts and authorities shall render to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunals direct all the assistance in their power, particularly as regards transmitting notices and collecting evidence.

"(g) The High Contracting Parties agree to regard the decisions of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal as final and conclusive, and to render them binding upon their nationals.

"ANNEX.

"1.

"Should one of the members of the Tribunal either die, retire, or be unable for any reason whatever to discharge his function, the same procedure will be followed for filling the vacancy as was followed for appointing him.

"2.

"The Tribunal may adopt such rules of procedure as shall be in accordance with justice and equity and decide the order and time at which each party must conclude its arguments, and may arrange all formalities required for dealing with the evidence.

"3.

"The agent and counsel of the parties on each side are authorized to present orally and in writing to the Tribunal arguments in support or in defence of each case.

"4.

"The Tribunal shall keep record of the questions and cases submitted and the proceedings thereon, with the dates of such proceedings.

"5.

"Each of the Powers concerned may appoint a secretary. These secretaries shall act together as joint secretaries of the Tribunal and shall be subject to its direction. The Tribunal may appoint and employ any other necessary officer or officers to assist in the performance of its duties.

"6.

"The Tribunal shall decide all questions and matters submitted upon such evidence and information as may be furnished by the parties concerned.

"7.

"Germany agrees to give the Tribunal all facilities and information required by it for carrying out its investigations.

"8.

"The language in which the proceedings shall be conducted shall, unless otherwise agreed, be English, French, Italian or Japanese, as may be determined by the Allied or Associated Power concerned.

"9.

"The place and time for the meetings of each Tribunal shall be determined by the President of the Tribunal.

"Article 305.

"Whenever a competent court has given or gives a decision in a case covered by Sections III, IV, V or VII. and such decision is inconsistent with the provisions of such Sections, the party who is prejudiced by the decision shall be entitled to obtain redress which shall be fixed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. At the request of the national of an Allied or Associated Power, the redress may, whenever possible, be effected by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal directing the replacement of the parties in the position occupied by them before the judgment was given by the German court.

"Section VII.

"INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY.

"Article 306.

"Subject to the stipulations of the present Treaty, rights of industrial, literary and artistic property, as such property is defined by the International Conventions of Paris and of Berne, mentioned in Article 286, shall be re-established or restored, as from the coming into force of the present Treaty, in the territories of the High Contracting Parties, in favour of the persons entitled to the benefit of them at the moment when the state of war commenced or their legal representatives. Equally, rights which, except for the war, would have been acquired during the war in consequence of an application made for the protection of industrial property, or the publication of a literary or artistic work, shall be recognized and established in favour of those persons who would have been entitled thereto, from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"Nevertheless, all acts done by virtue of the special measures taken during the war under legislative, executive or administrative authority of any Allied or Associated Power in regard to the rights of German nationals in industrial, literary or artistic property shall remain in force and shall continue to maintain their full effect.

"No claim shall be made or action brought by Germany or German nationals in respect of the use during the war by the Government of any Allied or Associated Power, or by any persons acting on behalf or with the assent of such Government, of any rights in industrial, literary or artistic property, nor in respect of the sale, offering for sale, or use of any products, articles or apparatus whatsoever to which such rights applied.

"Unless the legislation of any one of the Allied or Associated Powers in force at the moment of the signature of the present Treaty otherwise directs, sums due or paid in virtue of any act or operation resulting from the execution of the special measures mentioned in paragraph I of this Article shall be dealt with in the same way as other sums due to German nationals are directed to be dealt with by the present Treaty; and sums produced by any special measures taken by the German Government in respect of rights in industrial, literary or artistic property belonging to the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers shall be considered and treated in the same way as other debts due from German nationals.

"Each of the Allied and Associated Powers reserves to itself the right to impose such limitations, conditions or restrictions on rights of industrial, literary or artistic property (with the exception of trade-marks) acquired before or during the war, or which may be subsequently acquired in accordance with its legislation, by German nationals, whether by granting licenses, or by the working, or by preserving control over their exploitation, or in any other way, as may be considered necessary for national defence, or in the public interest, or for assuring the fair treatment by Germany of the rights of industrial, literary and artistic property held in German territory by its nationals, or for securing the due fulfilment of all the obligations undertaken by Germany in the present Treaty. As regards rights of industrial, literary and artistic property acquired after the coming into force of the present Treaty, the right so reserved by the Allied and Associated Powers shall only be exercised in cases where these limitations, conditions or restrictions may be considered necessary for national defence or in the public interest.

"In the event of the application of the provisions of the preceding paragraph by any Allied or Associated Power, there shall be paid reasonable indemnities or royalties, which shall be dealt with in the same way as other sums due to German nationals are directed to be dealt with by the present Treaty.

"Each of the Allied or Associated Powers reserves the right to treat as void and of no effect any transfer in whole or in part of or other dealing with rights of or in respect of industrial, literary or artistic property effected after August 1, 1914, or in the future, which would have the result of defeating the objects of the provisions of this Article.

"The provisions of this Article shall not apply to rights in industrial, literary or artistic property which have been dealt with in the liquidation of businesses or companies under war legislation by the Allied or Associated Powers, or which may be so dealt with by virtue of Article 297, paragraph (b).

"Article 307.

"A minimum of one year after the coming into force of the present Treaty shall be accorded to the nationals of the High Contracting Parties, without extension fees or other penalty, in order to enable such persons to accomplish any act, fulfil any formality, pay any fees, and generally satisfy any obligation prescribed by the laws or regulations of the respective States relating to the obtaining, preserving, or opposing rights to, or in respect of, industrial property either acquired before August 1, 1914, or which, except for the war, might have been acquired since that date as a result of an application made before the war or during its continuance, but nothing in this Article shall give any right to reopen interference proceedings in the United States of America where a final hearing has taken place.

"All rights in, or in respect of, such property which may have lapsed by reason of any failure to accomplish any act, fulfil any formality, or make any payment, shall revive, but subject in the case of patents and designs to the imposition of such conditions as each Allied or Associated Power may deem reasonably necessary for the protection of persons who have manufactured or made use of the subject matter of such property while the rights had lapsed. Further, where rights to patents or designs belonging to German nationals are revived under this Article, they shall be subject in respect of the grant of licences to the same provisions as would have been applicable to them during the war, as well as to all the provisions of the present Treaty.

"The period from August 1, 1914, until the coming into force of the present Treaty shall be excluded in considering the time within which a patent should be worked or a trade mark or design used, and it is further agreed that no patent, registered trade mark or design in force on August 1, 1914, shall be subject to revocation or cancellation by reason only of the failure to work such patent or use such trade mark or design for two years after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"Article 308.

"The rights of priority, provided by Article 4 of the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property of Paris, of March 20, 1883, revised at Washington in 1911 or by any other Convention or Statute, for the filing or registration of applications for patents or models of utility, and for the registration of trade marks, designs and models which had not expired on August 1, 1914, and those which have arisen during the war, or would have arisen but for the war, shall be extended by each of the High Contracting Parties in favour of all nationals of the other High Contracting Parties for a period of six months after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"Nevertheless, such extension shall in no way affect the right of any of the High Contracting Parties or of any person who before the coming into force of the present Treaty was bonâ fide in possession of any rights of industrial property conflicting with rights applied for by another who claims rights of priority in respect of them, to exercise such rights by itself or himself personally, or by such agents or licensees as derived their rights from it or him before the coming into force of the present Treaty; and such persons shall not be amenable to any action or other process of law in respect of infringement.

"Article 309.

"No action shall be brought and no claim made by persons residing or carrying on business within the territories of Germany on the one part and of the Allied or Associated Powers on the other, or persons who are nationals of such Powers respectively, or by any one deriving title during the war from such persons, by reason of any action which has taken place within the territory of the other party between the date of the declaration of war and that of the coming into force of the present Treaty, which might constitute an infringement of the rights of industrial property or rights of literary and artistic property, either existing at any time during the war or revived under the provisions of Articles 307 and 308.

"Equally, no action for infringement of industrial, literary or artistic property rights by such persons shall at any time be permissible in respect of the sale or offering for sale for a period of one year after the signature of the present Treaty in the territories of the Allied or Associated Powers on the one hand or Germany on the other, of products or articles manufactured, or of literary or artistic works published, during the period between the declaration of war and the signature of the present Treaty, or against those who have acquired and continue to use them. It is understood, nevertheless, that this provision shall not apply when the possessor of the rights was domiciled or had an industrial or commercial establishment in the districts occupied by Germany during the war.

"This Article shall not apply as between the United States of America on the one hand and Germany on the other.

"Article 310.

"Licences in respect of industrial, literary or artistic property concluded before the war between nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers or persons residing in their territory or carrying on business therein, on the one part, and German nationals, on the other part, shall be considered as cancelled as from the date of the declaration of war between Germany and the Allied or Associated Powers. But, in any case, the former beneficiary of a contract of this kind shall have the right, within a period of six months after the coming into force of the present Treaty, to demand from the proprietor of the rights the grant of a new licence, the conditions of which, in default of agreement between the parties, shall be fixed by the duly qualified tribunal in the country under whose legislation the rights had been acquired, except in the case of licences held in respect of rights acquired under German law. In such cases the conditions shall be fixed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal referred to in Section VI of this Part. The tribunal may, if necessary, fix also the amount which it may deem just should be paid by reason of the use of the rights during the war.

"No licence in respect of industrial, literary or artistic property, granted under the special war legislation of any Allied or Associated Power, shall be affected by the continued existence of any licence entered into before the war, but shall remain valid and of full effect, and a licence so granted to the former beneficiary of a licence entered into before the war shall be considered as substituted for such licence.

"Where sums have been paid during the war by virtue of a license or agreement concluded before the war in respect of rights of industrial property or for the reproduction or the representation of literary, dramatic or artistic works, these sums shall be dealt with in the same manner as other debts or credits of German nationals, as provided by the present Treaty.

"This Article shall not apply as between the United States of America on the one hand and Germany on the other.

"Article 311.

"The inhabitants of territories separated from Germany by virtue of the present Treaty shall, notwithstanding this separation and the change of nationality consequent thereon, continue to enjoy in Germany all the rights in industrial, literary and artistic property to which they were entitled under German legislation at the time of the separation.

"Rights of industrial, literary and artistic property which are in force in the territories separated from Germany under the present Treaty at the moment of the separation of these territories from Germany, or which will be re-established or restored in accordance with the provisions of Article 306 of the present Treaty, shall be recognized by the State to which the said territory is transferred and shall remain in force in that territory for the same period of time given them under the German law.

"Section VIII.

"SOCIAL AND STATE INSURANCE IN CEDED TERRITORY.

"Article 312.

"Without prejudice to the provisions contained in other Articles of the present Treaty, the German Government undertakes to transfer to any Power to which German territory in Europe is ceded, and to any Power administering former German territory as a mandatory under Article 22 of Part I (League of Nations), such portion of the reserves accumulated by the Government of the German Empire or of German States, or by public or private organisations under their control, as is attributable to the carrying on of Social or State Insurance in such territory.

"The Powers to which these funds are transferred must apply them to the performance of the obligations arising from such insurances.

"The conditions of the transfer will be determined by special conventions to be concluded between the German Government and the Governments concerned.

"In case these special conventions are not concluded in accordance with the above paragraph within three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty, the conditions of transfer shall in each case be referred to a Commission of five members, one of whom shall be appointed by the German Government, one by the other interested Government and three by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office from the nationals of other States. This Commission shall by majority vote within three months after appointment adopt recommendations for submission to the Council of the League of Nations, and the decisions of the Council shall forthwith be accepted as final by Germany and the other Government concerned.

"PART XI.

"AERIAL NAVIGATION.

"Article 313.

"The aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall have full liberty of passage and landing over and in the territory and territorial waters of Germany, and shall enjoy the same privileges as German aircraft, particularly in case of distress by land or sea.

"Article 314.

"The aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall, while in transit to any foreign country whatever, enjoy the right of flying over the territory and territorial waters of Germany without landing, subject always to any regulations which may be made by Germany, and which shall be applicable equally to the aircraft of Germany and to those of the Allied and Associated countries.

"Article 315.

"All aerodromes in Germany open to national public traffic shall be open for the aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers, and in any such aerodrome such aircraft shall be treated on a footing of equality with German aircraft as regards charges of every description, including charges for landing and accommodation.

"Article 316.

"Subject to the present provisions, the rights of passage, transit and landing, provided for in Articles 313, 314 and 315, are subject to the observance of such regulations as Germany may consider it necessary to enact, but such regulations shall be applied without distinction to German aircraft and to those of the Allied and Associated countries.

"Article 317.

"Certificates of nationality, airworthiness, or competency, and licences, issued or recognised as valid by any of the Allied or Associated Powers, shall be recognised in Germany as valid and as equivalent to the certificates and licences issued by Germany.

"Article 318.

"As regards internal commercial air traffic, the aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy in Germany most favoured nation treatment.

"Article 319.

"Germany undertakes to enforce the necessary measures to ensure that all German aircraft flying over her territory shall comply with the Rules as to lights and signals, Rules of the Air and Rules for Air Traffic on and in the neighbourhood of aerodromes, which have been laid down in the Convention relative to Aerial Navigation concluded between the Allied and Associated Powers.

"Article 320.

"The obligations imposed by the preceding provisions shall remain in force until January 1, 1923, unless before that date Germany shall have been admitted into the League of Nations or shall have been authorised, by consent of the Allied and Associated Powers, to adhere to the Convention relative to Aerial Navigation concluded between those Powers.

"PART XII.

"PORTS, WATERWAYS AND RAILWAYS.

"Section I.

"GENERAL PROVISIONS.

"Article 321.

"Germany undertakes to grant freedom of transit through her territories on the routes most convenient for international transit, either by rail, navigable waterway, or canal, to persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails coming from or going to the territories of any of the Allied and Associated Powers (whether contiguous or not); for this purpose the crossing of territorial waters shall be allowed. Such persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails shall not be subjected to any transit duty or to any undue delays or restrictions, and shall be entitled in Germany to national treatment as regards charges, facilities, and all other matters.

"Goods in transit shall be exempt from all Customs or other similar duties.

"All charges imposed on transport in transit shall be reasonable, having regard to the conditions of the traffic. No charge, facility or restriction shall depend directly or indirectly on the ownership or on the nationality of the ship or other means of transport on which any part of the through journey has been, or is to be, accomplished.

"Article 322.

"Germany undertakes neither to impose nor to maintain any control over transmigration traffic through her territories beyond measures necessary to ensure that passengers are bonâ fide in transit; nor to allow any shipping company or any other private body, corporation or person interested in the traffic to take any part whatever in, or to exercise any direct or indirect influence over, any administrative service that may be necessary for this purpose.

"Article 323.

"Germany undertakes to make no discrimination or preference, direct or indirect, in the duties, charges and prohibitions relating to importations into or exportation from her territories, or, subject to the special engagements contained in the present Treaty, in the charges and conditions of transport of goods or persons entering or leaving her territories, based on the frontier crossed; or on the kind, ownership or flag of the means of transport (including aircraft) employed; or on the original or immediate place of departure of the vessel, wagon or aircraft or other means of transport employed, or its ultimate or intermediate destination; or on the route of or places of transshipment on the journey; or on whether any port through which the goods are imported or exported is a German port or a port belonging to any foreign country or on whether the goods are imported or exported by sea, by land or by air.

"Germany particularly undertakes not to establish against the ports and vessels of any of the Allied and Associated Powers any surtax or any direct or indirect bounty for export or import by German ports or vessels, or by those of another Power, for example by means of combined tariffs. She further undertakes that persons or goods passing through a port or using a vessel of any of the Allied and Associated Powers shall not be subjected to any formality or delay whatever to which such persons or goods would not be subjected if they passed through a German port or a port of any other Power, or used a German vessel or a vessel of any other Power.

"Article 324.

"All necessary administrative and technical measures shall be taken to shorten, as much as possible, the transmission of goods across the German frontiers and to ensure their forwarding and transport from such frontiers, irrespective of whether such goods are coming from or going to the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers or are in transit from or to those territories, under the same material conditions in such matters as rapidity of carriage and care en route as are enjoyed by other goods of the same kind carried on German territory under similar conditions of transport.

"In particular, the transport of such perishable goods shall be promptly and regularly carried out, and the customs formalities shall be effected in such a way as to allow the goods to be carried straight through by trains which make connection.

"Article 325.

"The seaports of the Allied and Associated Powers are entitled to all favours and to all reduced tariffs granted on German railways or navigable waterways for the benefit of German ports or of any port of another Power.

"Article 326.

"Germany may not refuse to participate in the tariffs or combinations of tariffs intended to secure for ports of any of the Allied and Associated Powers advantages similar to those granted by Germany to her own ports or the ports of any other Power.

"Section II.

"NAVIGATION.

"Chapter I.

"FREEDOM OF NAVIGATION.

"Article 327.

"The nationals of any of the Allied and Associated Powers as well as their vessels and property shall enjoy in all German ports and on the inland navigation routes of Germany the same treatment in all respects as German nationals, vessels and property.

"In particular the vessels of any one of the Allied or Associated Powers shall be entitled to transport goods of any description, and passengers, to or from any ports or places in German territory to which German vessels may have access, under conditions which shall not be more onerous than those applied in the case of national vessels; they shall be treated on a footing of equality with national vessels as regards port and harbour facilities and charges of every description, including facilities for stationing, loading and unloading, and duties and charges of tonnage, harbour, pilotage, lighthouse, quarantine, and all analogous duties and charges of whatsoever nature, levied in the name of or for the profit of the Government, public functionaries, private individuals, corporations or establishments of any kind.

"In the event of Germany granting a preferential régime to any of the Allied or Associated Powers or to any other foreign Power, this régime shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to all the Allied and Associated Powers.

"There shall be no impediment to the movement of persons or vessels other than those arising from prescriptions concerning customs, police, sanitation, emigration and immigration, and those relating to the import and export of prohibited goods. Such regulations must be reasonable and uniform and must not impede traffic unnecessarily.

"Chapter II.

"FREE ZONES IN PORTS.

"Article 328.

"The free zones existing in German ports on August 1, 1914, shall be maintained. These free zones, and any other free zones which may be established in German territory by the present Treaty, shall be subject to the régime provided for in the following Articles.

"Goods entering or leaving a free zone shall not be subjected to any import or export duty, other than those provided for in Article 330.

"Vessels and goods entering a free zone may be subjected to the charges established to cover expenses of administration, upkeep and improvement of the port, as well as to the charges for the use of various installations, provided that these charges shall be reasonable having regard to the expenditure incurred, and shall be levied in the conditions of equality provided for in Article 327.

"Goods shall not be subjected to any other charge except a statistical duty which shall not exceed 1 per mille ad valorem, and which shall be devoted exclusively to defraying the expenses of compiling statements of the traffic in the port.

"Article 329.

"The facilities granted for the erection of warehouses, for packing and for unpacking goods, shall be in accordance with trade requirements for the time being. All goods allowed to be consumed in the free zone shall be exempt from duty, whether of excise or of any other description, apart from the statistical duty provided for in Article 328 above.

"There shall be no discrimination in regard to any of the provisions of the present Article between persons belonging to different nationalities or between goods of different origin or destination.

"Article 330.

"Import duties may be levied on goods leaving the free zone for consumption in the country on the territory of which the port is situated. Conversely, export duties may be levied on goods coming from such country and brought into the free zone. These import and export duties shall be levied on the same basis and at the same rates as similar duties levied at the other Customs frontiers of the country concerned. On the other hand, Germany shall not levy, under any denomination, any import, export or transit duty on goods carried by land or water across her territory to or from the free zone from or to any other State.

"Germany shall draw up the necessary regulations to secure and guarantee such freedom of transit over such railways and waterways in her territory as normally give access to the free zone.

"Chapter III.

"CLAUSES RELATING TO THE ELBE, THE ODER, THE NIEMEN (RUSSSTROM-MEMEL-NIEMEN) AND THE DANUBE.

"(I)—General Clauses.

"Article 331.

"The following rivers are declared international:

the Elbe (Labe) from its confluence with the Vltava (Moldau), and the Vltava (Moldau) from Prague;
the Oder (Odra) from its confluence with the Oppa;
the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) from Grodno;
the Danube from Ulm; and all navigable parts of these river systems which naturally provide more than one State with access to the sea, with or without transshipment from one vessel to another; together with lateral canals and channels constructed either to duplicate or to improve naturally navigable sections of the specified river systems, or to connect two naturally navigable sections of the same river.

"The same shall apply to the Rhine-Danube navigable waterway, should such a waterway be constructed under the conditions laid down in Article 353.

"Article 332.

"On the waterways declared to be international in the preceding Article, the nationals, property and flags of all Powers shall be treated on a footing of perfect equality, no distinction being made to the detriment of the nationals, property or flag of any Power between them and the nationals, property or flag of the riparian State itself or of most favoured nation.

"Nevertheless, German vessels shall not be entitled to carry passengers or goods by regular services between the ports of any Allied or Associated Power, without special authority from such Power.

"Article 333.

"Where such charges are not precluded by any existing conventions, charges varying on different sections of a river may be levied on vessels using the navigable channels or their approaches, provided that they are intended solely to cover equitably the cost of maintaining in a navigable condition, or of improving, the river and its approaches, or to meet expenditure incurred in the interests of navigation. The schedule of such charges shall be calculated on the basis of such expenditure and shall be posted up in the ports. These charges shall be levied in such a manner as to render any detailed examination of cargoes unnecessary, except in cases of suspected fraud or contravention.

"Article 334.

"The transit of vessels, passengers and goods on these waterways shall be effected in accordance with the general conditions prescribed for transit in Section I above.

"When the two banks of an international river are within the same State goods in transit may be placed under seal or in the custody of customs agents. When the river forms a frontier goods and passengers in transit shall be exempt from all customs formalities; the loading and unloading of goods, and the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers, shall only take place in the ports specified by the riparian State.

"Article 335.

"No dues of any kind other than those provided for in the present Part shall be levied along the course or at the mouth of these rivers.

"This provision shall not prevent the fixing by the riparian States of customs, local octroi or consumption duties, or the creation of reasonable and uniform charges levied in the ports, in accordance with public tariffs, for the use of cranes, elevators, quays, warehouses, etc.

"Article 336.

"In default of any special organisation for carrying out the works connected with the upkeep and improvement of the international portion of a navigable system, each riparian State shall be bound to take suitable measures to remove any obstacle or danger to navigation and to ensure the maintenance of good conditions of navigation.

"If a State neglects to comply with this obligation any riparian State, or any State represented on the International Commission, if there is one, may appeal to the tribunal instituted for this purpose by the League of Nations.

"Article 337.

"The same procedure shall be followed in the case of a riparian State undertaking any works of a nature to impede navigation in the international section. The tribunal mentioned in the preceding Article shall be entitled to enforce the suspension or suppression of such works, making due allowance in its decisions for all rights in connection with irrigation, water-power, fisheries, and other national interests, which, with the consent of all the riparian States or of all the States represented on the International Commission, if there is one, shall be given priority over the requirements of navigation.

"Appeal to the tribunal of the League of Nations does not require the suspension of the works.

"Article 338.

"The régime set out in Articles 332 to 337 above shall be superseded by one to be laid down in a General Convention drawn up by the Allied and Associated Powers, and approved by the League of Nations, relating to the waterways recognised in such Convention as having an international character. This Convention shall apply in particular to the whole or part of the above-mentioned river systems of the Elbe (Labe), the Oder (Odra), the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen), and the Danube, and such other parts of these river systems as may be covered by a general definition.

"Germany undertakes, in accordance with the provisions of Article 379, to adhere to the said General Convention as well as to all projects prepared in accordance with Article 343 below for the revision of existing international agreements and regulations.

"Article 339.

"Germany shall cede to the Allied and Associated Powers concerned, within a maximum period of three months from the date on which notification shall be given her, a proportion of the tugs and vessels remaining registered in the ports of the river systems referred to in Article 331 after the deduction of those surrendered by way of restitution or reparation. Germany shall in the same way cede material of all kinds necessary to the Allied and Associated Powers concerned for the utilisation of those river systems.

"The number of the tugs and boats, and the amount of the material so ceded, and their distribution, shall be determined by an arbitrator or arbitrators nominated by the United States of America, due regard being had to the legitimate needs of the parties concerned, and particularly to the shipping traffic during the five years preceding the war.

"All craft so ceded shall be provided with their fittings and gear, shall be in a good state of repair and in condition to carry goods, and shall be selected from among those most recently built.

"The cessions provided for in the present Article shall entail a credit of which the total amount, settled in a lump sum by the arbitrator or arbitrators, shall not in any case exceed the value of the capital expended in the initial establishment of the material ceded, and shall be set off against the total sums due from Germany; in consequence, the indemnification of the proprietors shall be a matter for Germany to deal with.

"(2) Special Clauses relating to the Elbe, the Oder and the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen).

"Article 340.

"The Elbe (Labe) shall be placed under the administration of an International Commission which shall comprise:

"4 representatives of the German States bordering on the river;

"2 representatives of the Czecho-Slovak State;

"1 representative of Great Britain;

"1 representative of France;

"1 representative of Italy;

"1 representative of Belgium.

"Whatever be the number of members present, each delegation shall have the right to record a number of votes equal to the number of representatives allotted to it.

"If certain of these representatives cannot be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the Commission shall nevertheless be valid.

"Article 341.

"The Oder (Odra) shall be placed under the administration of an International Commission, which shall comprise:

"1 representative of Poland;

"3 representatives of Prussia;

"1 representative of the Czecho-Slovak State;

"1 representative of Great Britain;

"1 representative of France;

"1 representative of Denmark;

"1 representative of Sweden.

"If certain of these representatives cannot be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the Commission shall nevertheless be valid.

"Article 342.

"On a request being made to the League of Nations by any riparian State, the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) shall be placed under the administration of an International Commission, which shall comprise one representative of each riparian State, and three representatives of other States specified by the League of Nations.

"Article 343.

"The International Commissions referred to in Articles 340 and 341 shall meet within three months of the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty. The International Commission referred to in Article 342 shall meet within three months from the date of the request made by a riparian State. Each of these Commissions shall proceed immediately to prepare a project for the revision of the existing international agreements and regulations, drawn up in conformity with the General Convention referred to in Article 338, should such Convention have been already concluded. In the absence of such Convention, the project for revision shall be in conformity with the principles of Articles 332 to 337 above.

"Article 344.

"The projects referred to in the preceding Article shall, inter alia:

"(a) designate the headquarters of the International Commission, and prescribe the manner in which its President is to be nominated;

"(b) specify the extent of the Commission's powers, particularly in regard to the execution of works of maintenance, control, and improvement on the river system, the financial régime, the fixing and collection of charges, and regulations for navigation;

"(c) define the sections of the river or its tributaries to which the international régime shall be applied.

"Article 345.

"The international agreements and regulations at present governing the navigation of the Elbe (Labe), the Oder (Odra), and the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) shall be provisionally maintained in force until the ratification of the above-mentioned projects. Nevertheless, in all cases where such agreements and regulations in force are in conflict with the provisions of Articles 332 to 337 above, or of the General Convention to be concluded, the latter provisions shall prevail.

"(3) Special Clauses relating to the Danube.

"Article 346.

"The European Commission of the Danube reassumes the powers it possessed before the war. Nevertheless, as a provisional measure, only representatives of Great Britain, France, Italy and Roumania shall constitute this Commission.

"Article 347.

"From the point where the competence of the European Commission ceases, the Danube system referred to in Article 331 shall be placed under the administration of an International Commission composed as follows:

"2 representatives of German riparian States;

"1 representative of each other riparian State;

"1 representative of each non-riparian State represented in the future on the European Commission of the Danube.

"If certain of these representatives cannot be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the Commission shall nevertheless be valid.

"Article 348.

"The International Commission provided for in the preceding Article shall meet as soon as possible after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and shall undertake provisionally the administration of the river in conformity with the provisions of Articles 332 to 337, until such time as a definitive statute regarding the Danube is concluded by the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers.

"Article 349.

"Germany agrees to accept the régime which shall be laid down for the Danube by a Conference of the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers, which shall meet within one year after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and at which German representatives may be present.

"Article 350.

"The mandate given by Article 57 of the Treaty of Berlin of July 13, 1878, to Austria-Hungary, and transferred by her to Hungary, to carry out works at the Iron Gates, is abrogated. The Commission entrusted with the administration of this part of the river shall lay down provisions for the settlement of accounts subject to the financial provisions of the present Treaty. Charges which may be necessary shall in no case be levied by Hungary.

"Article 351.

"Should the Czecho-Slovak State, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State or Roumania, with the authorisation of or under mandate from the International Commission, undertake maintenance, improvement, weir, or other works on a part of the river system which forms a frontier, these States shall enjoy on the opposite bank, and also on the part of the bed which is outside their territory, all necessary facilities for the survey, execution and maintenance of such works.

"Article 352.

"Germany shall be obliged to make to the European Commission of the Danube all restitutions, reparations and indemnities for damages inflicted on the Commission during the war.

"Article 353.

"Should a deep-draught Rhine-Danube navigable waterway be constructed, Germany undertakes to apply thereto the régime prescribed in Articles 332 to 338.

"Chapter IV.

"CLAUSES RELATING TO THE RHINE AND THE MOSELLE.

"Article 354.

"As from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Convention of Mannheim of October 17, 1868, together with the Final Protocol thereof, shall continue to govern navigation on the Rhine, subject to the conditions hereinafter laid down.

"In the event of any provisions of the said Convention being in conflict with those laid down by the General Convention referred to in Article 338 (which shall apply to the Rhine) the provisions of the General Convention shall prevail.

"Within a maximum period of six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Central Commission referred to in Article 355 shall meet to draw up a project of revision of the Convention of Mannheim. This project shall be drawn up in harmony with the provisions of the General Convention referred to above, should this have been concluded by that time, and shall be submitted to the Powers represented on the Central Commission. Germany hereby agrees to adhere to the project so drawn up.

"Further, the modifications set out in the following Articles shall immediately be made in the Convention of Mannheim.

"The Allied and Associated Powers reserve to themselves the right to arrive at an understanding in this connection with Holland, and Germany hereby agrees to accede if required to any such understanding.

"Article 355.

"The Central Commission provided for in the Convention of Mannheim shall consist of nineteen members, viz.:

"2 representatives of the Netherlands;

"2 representatives of Switzerland;

"4 representatives of German riparian States;

"4 representatives of France, which in addition shall appoint the President of the Commission;

"2 representatives of Great Britain;

"2 representatives of Italy;

"2 representatives of Belgium.

"The headquarters of the Central Commission shall be at Strasburg.

"Whatever be the number of members present, each Delegation shall have the right to record a number of votes equal to the number of representatives allotted to it.

"If certain of these representatives cannot be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the Commission shall nevertheless be valid.

"Article 356.

"Vessels of all nations, and their cargoes, shall have the same rights and privileges as those which are granted to vessels belonging to the Rhine navigation, and to their cargoes.

"None of the provisions contained in Articles 15 to 20 and 26 of the above-mentioned Convention of Mannheim, in Article 4 of the Final Protocol thereof, or in later Conventions, shall impede the free navigation of vessels and crews of all nations on the Rhine and on waterways to which such Conventions apply, subject to compliance with the regulations concerning pilotage and other police measures drawn up by the Central Commission.

"The provisions of Article 22 of the Convention of Mannheim and of Article 5 of the Final Protocol thereof shall be applied only to vessels registered on the Rhine. The Central Commission shall decide on the steps to be taken to ensure that other vessels satisfy the conditions of the general regulations applying to navigation on the Rhine.

"Article 357.

"Within a maximum period of three months from the date on which notification shall be given Germany shall cede to France tugs and vessels, from among those remaining registered in German Rhine ports after the deduction of those surrendered by way of restitution or reparation, or shares in German Rhine navigation companies.

"When vessels and tugs are ceded, such vessels and tugs, together with their fittings and gear, shall be in good state of repair, shall be in condition to carry on commercial traffic on the Rhine, and shall be selected from among those most recently built.

"The same procedure shall be followed in the matter of the cession by Germany to France of:

"(1) the installations, berthing and anchorage accommodation, platforms, docks, warehouses, plant, etc., which German subjects or German companies owned on August 1, 1914, in the port of Rotterdam, and

"(2) the shares or interests which Germany or German nationals possessed in such installations at the same date.

"The amount and specifications of such cessions shall be determined within one year of the coming into force of the present

Treaty by an arbitrator or arbitrators appointed by the United States of America, due regard being had to the legitimate needs of the parties concerned.

"The cessions provided for in the present Article shall entail a credit of which the total amount, settled in a lump sum by the arbitrator or arbitrators mentioned above, shall not in any case exceed the value of the capital expended in the initial establishment of the ceded material and installations, and shall be set off against the total sums due from Germany; in consequence, the indemnification of the proprietors shall be a matter for Germany to deal with.

"Article 358.

"Subject to the obligation to comply with the provisions of the Convention of Mannheim or of the Convention which may be substituted therefor, and to the stipulations of the present Treaty, France shall have on the whole course of the Rhine included between the two extreme points of the French frontiers:

(a) the right to take water from the Rhine to feed navigation and irrigation canals (constructed or to be constructed) or for any other purpose, and to execute on the German bank all works necessary for the exercise of this right;

"(b) the exclusive right to the power derived from works of regulation on the river, subject to the payment to Germany of the value of half the power actually produced, this payment, which will take into account the cost of the works necessary for producing the power, being made either in money or in power and in default of agreement being determined by arbitration. For this purpose France alone shall have the right to carry out in this part of the river all works of regulation (weirs or other works) which she may consider necessary for the production of power. Similarly, the right of taking water from the Rhine is accorded to Belgium to feed the Rhine-Meuse navigable waterway provided for below.

"The exercise of the rights mentioned under (a) and (b) of the present Article shall not interfere with navigability, nor reduce the facilities for navigation, either in the bed of the Rhine or in the derivations which may be substituted therefor, nor shall it involve any increase in the tolls formerly levied under the Convention in force. All proposed schemes shall be laid before the Central Commission in order that that Commission may assure itself that these conditions are complied with.

"To ensure the proper and faithful execution of the provisions contained in (a) and (b) above, Germany:

"(1) binds herself not to undertake or to allow the construction of any lateral canal or any derivation on the right bank of the river opposite the French frontiers;

"(2) recognises the possession by France of the right of support on and the right of way over all lands situated on the right bank which may be required in order to survey, to build, and to operate weirs which France, with the consent of the Central Commission, may subsequently decide to establish. In accordance with such consent, France shall be entitled to decide upon and fix the limits of the necessary sites, and she shall be permitted to occupy such lands after a period of two months after simple notification, subject to the payment by her to Germany of indemnities of which the total amount shall be fixed by the Central Commission. Germany shall make it her business to indemnify the proprietors whose property will be burdened with such servitudes or permanently occupied by the works.

"Should Switzerland so demand, and if the Central Commission approves, the same rights shall be accorded to Switzerland for the part of the river forming her frontier with other riparian States;

"(3) shall hand over to the French Government, during the month following the coming into force of the present Treaty, all projects, designs, drafts of concessions and of specifications concerning the regulation of the Rhine for any purpose whatever which have been drawn up or received by the Governments of Alsace-Lorraine or of the Grand Duchy of Baden.

"Article 359.

"Subject to the preceding provisions, no works shall be carried out in the bed or on either bank of the Rhine where it forms the boundary of France and Germany without the previous approval of the Central Commission or of its agents.

"Article 360.

"France reserves the option of substituting herself as regards the rights and obligations resulting from agreements arrived at between the Government of Alsace-Lorraine and the Grand Duchy of Baden concerning the works to be carried out on the Rhine; she may also denounce such agreements within a term of five years dating from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"France shall also have the option of causing works to be carried out which may be recognised as necessary by the Central Commission for the upkeep or improvement of the navigability of the Rhine above Mannheim.

"Article 361.

"Should Belgium within a period of 25 years from the coming into force of the present Treaty decide to create a deep-draught Rhine-Meuse navigable waterway, in the region of Ruhrort, Germany shall be bound to construct, in accordance with plans to be communicated to her by the Belgian Government, after agreement with the Central Commission, the portion of this navigable waterway situated within her territory.

"The Belgian Government shall, for this purpose, have the right to carry out on the ground all necessary surveys.

"Should Germany fail to carry out all or part of these works, the Central Commission shall be entitled to carry them out instead; and, for this purpose, the Commission may decide upon and fix the limits of the necessary sites and occupy the ground after a period of two months after simple notification, subject to the payment of indemnities to be fixed by it and paid by Germany.

"This navigable waterway shall be placed under the same administrative régime as the Rhine itself, and the division of the cost of initial construction, including the above indemnities, among the States crossed thereby shall be made by the Central Commission.

"Article 362.

"Germany hereby agrees to offer no objection to any proposals of the Central Rhine Commission for extending its jurisdiction:

"(1) to the Moselle below the Franco-Luxemburg frontier down to the Rhine, subject to the consent of Luxemburg;

"(2) to the Rhine above Basle up to the Lake of Constance, subject to the consent of Switzerland;

"(3) to the lateral canals and channels which may be established either to duplicate or to improve naturally navigable sections of the Rhine or the Moselle, or to connect two naturally navigable sections of these rivers, and also any other parts of the Rhine river system which may be covered by the General Convention provided for in Article 338 above.

"Chapter V.

"CLAUSES GIVING TO THE CZECHO-SLOVAK STATE THE USE OF NORTHERN PORTS.

"Article 363.

"In the ports of Hamburg and Stettin Germany shall lease to the Czecho-Slovak State, for a period of 99 years, areas which shall be placed under the general régime of free zones and shall be used for the direct transit of goods coming from or going to that State.

"Article 364.

"The delimitation of these areas, and their equipment, their exploitation, and in general all conditions for their utilisation, including the amount of the rental, shall be decided by a Commission consisting of one delegate of Germany, one delegate of the Czecho-Slovak State and one delegate of Great Britain. These conditions shall be susceptible of revision every ten years in the same manner.

"Germany declares in advance that she will adhere to the decisions so taken.

"Section III.

"RAILWAYS.

"Chapter I.

"CLAUSES RELATING TO INTERNATIONAL TRANSPORT.

"Article 365.

"Goods coming from the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers, and going to Germany, or in transit through Germany from or to the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers, shall enjoy on the German railways as regards charges to be collected (rebates and drawbacks being taken into account), facilities, and all other matters, the most favourable treatment applied to goods of the same kind carried on any German lines, either in internal traffic, or for export, import or in transit, under similar conditions of transport, for example as regards length of route. The same rule shall be applied, on the request of one or more of the Allied and Associated Powers, to goods specially designated by such Power or Powers coming from Germany and going to their territories.

"International tariffs established in accordance with the rates referred to in the preceding paragraph and involving through waybills shall be established when one of the Allied and Associated Powers shall require it from Germany.

"Article 366.

"From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall renew, in so far as concerns them and under the reserves indicated in the second paragraph of the present Article, the conventions and arrangements signed at Berne on October 14, 1890, September 20, 1893, July 16, 1895, June 16, 1898, and September 19, 1906, regarding the transportation of goods by rail.

"If within five years from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty a new convention for the transportation of passengers, luggage and goods by rail shall have been concluded to replace the Berne Convention of October 14, 1890, and the subsequent additions referred to above, this new convention and the supplementary provisions for international transport by rail which may be based on it shall bind Germany, even if she shall have refused to take part in the preparation of the convention or to subscribe to it. Until a new convention shall have been concluded, Germany shall conform to the provisions of the Berne Convention and the subsequent additions referred to above, and to the current supplementary provisions.

"Article 367.

"Germany shall be bound to co-operate in the establishment of through ticket services (for passengers and their luggage) which shall be required by any of the Allied and Associated Powers to ensure their communcation by rail with each other and with all other countries by transit across the territories of Germany; in particular Germany shall, for this purpose, accept trains and carriages coming from the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers and shall forward them with a speed at least equal to that of her best long-distance trains on the same lines. The rates applicable to such through services shall not in any case be higher than the rates collected on German internal services for the same distance, under the same conditions of speed and comfort.

"The tariffs applicable under the same conditions of speed and comfort to the transportation of emigrants going to or coming from ports of the Allied and Associated Powers and using the German railways shall not be at a higher kilometric rate than the most favourable tariffs (drawbacks and rebates being taken into account) enjoyed on the said railways by emigrants going to or coming from any other ports.

"Article 368.

"Germany shall not apply specially to such through services, or to the transportation of emigrants going to or coming from the ports of the Allied and Associated Powers, any technical, fiscal or administrative measures, such as measures of customs examination, general police, sanitary police, and control, the result of which would be to impede or delay such services.

"Article 369.

"In case of transport partly by rail and partly by internal navigation, with or without through way-bill, the preceding Articles shall apply to the part of the journey performed by rail.

"Chapter II.

"ROLLING-STOCK.

"Article 370.

"Germany undertakes that German wagons shall be fitted with apparatus allowing:

"(1) of their inclusion in goods trains on the lines of such of the Allied and Associated Powers as are parties to the Berne Convention of May 15, 1886, as modified on May 18, 1907, without hampering the action of the continuous brake which may be adopted in such countries within ten years of the coming into force of the present Treaty, and

"(2) of the acceptance of wagons of such countries in all goods trains on the German lines.

"The rolling stock of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy on the German lines the same treatment as German rolling stock as regards movement, upkeep and repairs.

"Chapter III.

"CESSIONS OF RAILWAY LINES.

"Article 371.

"Subject to any special provisions concerning the cession of ports, waterways and railways situated in the territories over which Germany abandons her sovereignty, and to the financial conditions relating to the concessionnaires and the pensioning of the personnel, the cession of railways will take place under the following conditions:

"(1) The works and installations of all the railroads shall be handed over complete and in good condition.

"(2) When a railway system possessing its own rolling-stock is handed over in its entirety by Germany to one of the Allied and Associated Powers, such stock shall be handed over complete, in accordance with the last inventory before November 11, 1918, and in a normal state of upkeep.

"(3) As regards lines without any special rolling-stock, Commissions of experts designated by the Allied and Associated Powers, on which Germany shall be represented, shall fix the proportion of the stock existing on the system to which those lines belong to be handed over. These Commissions shall have regard to the amount of the material registered on these lines in the last inventory before November 11, 1918, the length of track (sidings included), and the nature and amount of the traffic. These Commissions shall also specify the locomotives, carriages and wagons to be handed over in each case; they shall decide upon the conditions of their acceptance, and shall make the provisional arrangements necessary to ensure their repair in German workshops.

"(4) Stocks of stores, fittings and plant shall be handed over under the same conditions as the rolling-stock.

"The provisions of paragraphs 3 and 4 above shall be applied to the lines of former Russian Poland converted by Germany to the German gauge, such lines being regarded as detached from the Prussian State System.

"Chapter IV.

"PROVISIONS RELATING TO CERTAIN RAILWAY LINES.

"Article 372.

"When as a result of the fixing of new frontiers a railway connection between two parts of the same country crosses another country, or a branch line from one country has its terminus in another, the conditions of working, if not specifically provided for in the present Treaty, shall be laid down in a convention between the railway administrations concerned. If the administrations cannot come to an agreement as to the terms of such convention, the points of difference shall be decided by commissions of experts composed as provided in the preceding Article.

"Article 373.

"Within a period of five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty the Czecho-Slovak State may require the construction of a railway line in German territory between the stations of Schlauney and Nachod. The cost of construction shall be borne by the Czecho-Slovak State.

"Article 374.

"Germany undertakes to accept, within ten years of the coming into force of the present Treaty, on request being made by the Swiss Government after agreement with the Italian Government, the denunciation of the International Convention of October 13, 1909, relative to the St. Gothard railway. In the absence of agreement as to the conditions of such denunciation, Germany hereby agrees to accept the decision of an arbitrator designated by the United States of America.

"Chapter V.

"TRANSITORY PROVISIONS.

"Article 375.

"Germany shall carry out the instructions given her, in regard to transport, by an authorised body acting on behalf of the Allied and Associated Powers:

"(1) For the carriage of troops under the provisions of the present Treaty, and of material, ammunition and supplies for army use;

"(2) As a temporary measure, for the transportation of supplies for certain regions, as well as for the restoration, as rapidly as possible, of the normal conditions of transport, and for the organisation of postal and telegraphic services.

"Section IV.

"DISPUTES AND REVISION OF PERMANENT CLAUSES.

"Article 376.

"Disputes which may arise between interested Powers with regard to the interpretation and application of the preceding Articles shall be settled as provided by the League of Nations.

"Article 377.

"At any time the League of Nations may recommend the revision of such of these Articles as relate to a permanent administrative régime.

"Article 378.

"The stipulations in Articles 321 to 330, 332, 365, and 367 to 369 shall be subject to revision by the Council of the League of Nations at any time after five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"Failing such revision, no Allied or Associated Power can claim after the expiration of the above period of five years the benefit of any of the stipulations in the Articles enumerated above on behalf of any portion of its territories in which reciprocity is not accorded in respect of such stipulations. The period of five years during which reciprocity cannot be demanded may be prolonged by the Council of the League of Nations.

"Section V.

"SPECIAL PROVISION.

"Article 379.

"Without prejudice to the special obligations imposed on her by the present Treaty for the benefit of the Allied and Associated Powers, Germany undertakes to adhere to any General Conventions regarding the international régime of transit, waterways, ports or railways which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers, with the approval of the League of Nations, within five years of the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"Section VI.

"CAUSES RELATING TO THE KIEL CANAL.

"Article 380.

"The Kiel Canal and its approaches shall be maintained free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations at peace with Germany on terms of entire equality.

"Article 381.

"The nationals, property and vessels of all Powers shall, in respect of charges, facilities, and in all other respects, be treated on a footing of perfect equality in the use of the Canal, no distinction being made to the detriment of nationals, property and vessels of any Power between them and the nationals, property and vessels of Germany or of the most favoured nation.

"No impediment shall be placed on the movement of persons or vessels other than those arising out of police, customs, sanitary, emigration or immigration regulations and those relating to the import or export of prohibited goods. Such regulations must be reasonable and uniform and must not unnecessarily impede traffic.

"Article 382.

"Only such charges may be levied on vessels using the Canal or its approaches as are intended to cover in an equitable manner the cost of maintaining in a navigable condition, or of improving, the Canal or its approaches, or to meet expenses incurred in the interests of navigation. The schedule of such charges shall be calculated on the basis of such expenses, and shall be posted up in the ports.

"These charges shall be levied in such a manner as to render any detailed examination of cargoes unnecessary, except in the case of suspected fraud or contravention.

"Article 383.

"Goods in transit may be placed under seal or in the custody of customs agents; the loading and unloading of goods, and the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers, shall only take place in the ports specified by Germany.

"Article 384.

"No charges of any kind other than those provided for in the present Treaty shall be levied along the course or at the approaches of the Kiel Canal.

"Article 385.

"Germany shall be bound to take suitable measures to remove any obstacle or danger to navigation, and to ensure the maintenance of good conditions of navigation. She shall not undertake any works of a nature to impede navigation on the Canal or its approaches.

"Article 386.

"In the event of violation of any of the conditions of Articles 380 to 386, or of disputes as to the interpretation of these Articles, any interested Power can appeal to the jurisdiction instituted for the purpose by the League of Nations.

"In order to avoid reference of small questions to the League of Nations, Germany will establish a local authority at Kiel qualified to deal with disputes in the first instance and to give satisfaction so far as possible to complaints which may be presented through the consular representatives of the interested Powers.

"PART XIII.

"LABOUR.

"Section I.

"ORGANISATION OF LABOUR.

"Whereas the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice;

"And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required: as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organisation of vocational and technical education and other measures;

"Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries;

"THE HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES, moved by sentiments of justice and humanity as well as by the desire to secure the permanent peace of the world, agree to the following:

"Chapter I.

"ORGANISATION.

"Article 387.

"A permanent organisation is hereby established for the promotion of the objects set forth in the Preamble.

"The original Members of the League of Nations shall be the original Members of this organisation, and hereafter membership of the League of Nations shall carry with it membership of the said organisation.

"Article 388.

"The permanent organisation shall consist of:

"(1) a General Conference of Representatives of the Members and,

"(2) an International Labour Office controlled by the Governing Body described in Article 393.

"Article 389.

"The meetings of the General Conference of Representatives of the Members shall be held from time to time as occasion may require, and at least once in every year. It shall be composed of four Representatives of each of the Members, of whom two shall be Government Delegates and the two others shall be Delegates representing respectively the employers and the workpeople of each of the Members.

"Each Delegate may be accompanied by advisers, who shall not exceed two in number for each item on the agenda of the meeting. When questions specially affecting women are to be considered by the Conference, one at least of the advisers should be a woman.

"The Members undertake to nominate non-Government Delegates and advisers chosen in agreement with the industrial organisations, if such organisations exist, which are most representative of employers or workpeople, as the case may be, in their respective countries.

"Advisers shall not speak except on a request made by the Delegate whom they accompany and by the special authorization of the President of the Conference, and may not vote.

"A Delegate may by notice in writing addressed to the President appoint one of his advisers to act as his deputy, and the adviser, while so acting, shall be allowed to speak and vote.

"The names of the Delegates and their advisers will be communicated to the International Labour Office by the Government of each of the Members.

"The credentials of Delegates and their advisers shall be subject to scrutiny by the Conference, which may, by two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present, refuse to admit any Delegate or adviser whom it deems not to have been nominated in accordance with this Article.

"Article 390.

"Every Delegate shall be entitled to vote individually on all matters which are taken into consideration by the Conference.

"If one of the Members fails to nominate one of the non-Government Delegates whom it is entitled to nominate, the other non-Government Delegate shall be allowed to sit and speak at the Conference, but not to vote.

"If in accordance with Article 389 the Conference refuses admission to a Delegate of one of the Members, the provisions of the present Article shall apply as if that Delegate had not been nominated.

"Article 391.

"The meetings of the Conference shall be held at the seat of the League of Nations, or at such other place as may be decided by the Conference at a previous meeting by two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present.

"Article 392.

"The International Labour Office shall be established at the seat of the League of Nations as part of the organisation of the League.

"Article 393.

"The International Labour Office shall be under the control of a Governing Body consisting of twenty-four persons, appointed in accordance with the following provisions:

"The Governing Body of the International Labour Office shall be constituted as follows:

"Twelve persons representing the Governments;

"Six persons elected by the Delegates to the Conference representing the employers;

"Six persons elected by the Delegates to the Conference representing the workers.

"Of the twelve persons representing the Governments eight shall be nominated by the Members which are of the chief industrial importance, and four shall be nominated by the Members selected for the purpose by the Government Delegates to the Conference, excluding the Delegates of the eight Members mentioned above.

"Any question as to which are the Members of the chief industrial importance shall be decided by the Council of the League of Nations.

"The period of office of the Members of the Governing Body will be three years. The method of filling vacancies and other similar questions may be determined by the Governing Body subject to the approval of the Conference.

"The Governing Body shall, from time to time, elect one of its members to act as its Chairman, shall regulate its own procedure and shall fix its own times of meeting. A special meeting shall be held if a written request to that effect is made by at least ten members of the Governing Body.

"Article 394.

"There shall be a Director of the International Labour Office, who shall be appointed by the Governing Body, and, subject to the instructions of the Governing Body, shall be responsible for the efficient conduct of the International Labour Office and for such other duties as may be assigned to him.

"The Director or his deputy shall attend all meetings of the Governing Body.

"Article 395.

"The staff of the International Labour Office shall be appointed by the Director, who shall, so far as is possible with due regard to the efficiency of the work of the Office, select persons of different nationalities. A certain number of these persons shall be women.

"Article 396.

"The functions of the International Labour Office shall include the collection and distribution of information on all subjects relating to the international adjustment of conditions of industrial life and labour, and particularly the examination of subjects which it is proposed to bring before the Conference with a view to the conclusion of international conventions, and the conduct of such special investigations as may be ordered by the Conference.

"It will prepare the agenda for the meetings of the Conference.

"It will carry out the duties required of it by the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty in connection with international disputes.

"It will edit and publish in French and English, and in such other languages as the Governing Body may think desirable, a periodical paper dealing with problems of industry and employment of international interest.

"Generally, in addition to the functions set out in this Article, it shall have such other powers and duties as may be assigned to it by the Conference.

"Article 397.

"The Government Departments of any of the Members which deal with questions of industry and employment may communicate directly with the Director through the Representative of their Government on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, or failing any such Representative, through such other qualified official as the Government may nominate for the purpose.

"Article 398.

"The International Labour Office shall be entitled to the assistance of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations in any matter in which it can be given.

"Article 399.

"Each of the Members will pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of its Delegates and their advisers and of its Representatives attending the meetings of the Conference or Governing Body, as the case may be.

"All the other expenses of the International Labour Office and of the meetings of the Conference or Governing Body shall be paid to the Director by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations out of the general funds of the League.

"The Director shall be responsible to the Secretary-General of the League for the proper expenditure of all moneys paid to him in pursuance of this Article.

"Chapter II.

"PROCEDURE.

"Article 400.

"The agenda for all meetings of the Conference will be settled by the Governing Body, who shall consider any suggestion as to the agenda that may be made by the Government of any of the Members or by any representative organisation recognised for the purpose of Article 389.

"Article 401.

"The Director shall act as the Secretary of the Conference, and shall transmit the agenda so as to reach the Members four months before the meeting of the Conference, and, through them, the non-Government Delegates when appointed.

"Article 402.

"Any of the Governments of the Members may formally object to the inclusion of any item or items in the agenda. The grounds for such objection shall be set forth in a reasoned statement addressed to the Director, who shall circulate it to all the Members of the Permanent Organisation.

"Items to which such objection has been made shall not, however, be excluded from the agenda, if at the Conference a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present is in favour of considering them.

"If the Conference decides (otherwise than under the preceding paragraph) by two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present that any subject shall be considered by the Conference, that subject shall be included in the agenda for the following meeting.

"Article 403.

"The Conference shall regulate its own procedure, shall elect its own President, and may appoint committees to consider and report on any matter.

"Except as otherwise expressly provided in this Part of the present Treaty, all matters shall be decided by a simple majority of the votes cast by the Delegates present.

"The voting is void unless the total number of votes cast is equal to half the number of the Delegates attending the Conference.

"Article 404.

"The Conference may add to any committees which it appoints technical experts, who shall be assessors without power to vote.

"Article 405.

"When the Conference has decided on the adoption of proposals with regard to an item in the agenda, it will rest with the Conference to determine whether these proposals should take the form: (a) of a recommendation to be submitted to the Members for consideration with a view to effect being given to it by national legislation or otherwise, or (b) of a draft international convention for ratification by the Members.

"In either case a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present shall be necessary on the final vote for the adoption of the recommendation or draft convention, as the case may be, by the Conference.

"In framing any recommendation or draft convention of general application the Conference shall have due regard to those countries in which climatic conditions, the imperfect development of industrial organisation or other special circumstances make the industrial conditions substantially different and shall suggest the modifications, if any, which it considers may be required to meet the case of such countries.

"A copy of the recommendation or draft convention shall be authenticated by the signature of the President of the Conference and of the Director and shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the League of Nations. The Secretary-General will communicate a certified copy of the recommendation or draft convention to each of the Members.

"Each of the Members undertakes that it will, within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the Conference, or if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than eighteen months from the closing of the session of the Conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action.

"In the case of a recommendation, the Members will inform the Secretary-General of the action taken.

"In the case of a draft convention, the Member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, communicate the formal ratification of the convention to the Secretary-General and will take such action as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of such convention.

"If on a recommendation no legislative or other action is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, no further obligation shall rest upon the Member.

"In the case of a federal State, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that Government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this Article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

"The above Article shall be interpreted in accordance with the following principle:

"In no case shall any Member be asked or required, as a result of the adoption of any recommendation or draft convention by the Conference, to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned.

"Article 406.

"Any convention so ratified shall be registered by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, but shall only be binding upon the Members which ratify it.

"Article 407.

"If any convention coming before the Conference for final consideration fails to secure the support of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present, it shall nevertheless be within the right of any of the Members of the Permanent Organisation to agree to such convention among themselves.

"Any convention so agreed to shall be communicated by the Governments concerned to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, who shall register it.

"Article 408.

"Each of the Members agrees to make an annual report to the International Labour Office on the measures which it has taken to give effect to the provisions of conventions to which it is a party. These reports shall be made in such form and shall contain such particulars as the Governing Body may request. The Director shall lay a summary of these reports before the next meeting of the Conference.

"Article 409.

"In the event of any representation being made to the international Labour Office by an industrial association of employers or of workers that any of the Members has failed to secure in any respect the effective observance within its jurisdiction of any convention to which it is a party, the Governing Body may communicate this representation to the Government against which it is made and may invite that Government to make such statement on the subject as it may think fit.

"Article 410.

"If no statement is received within a reasonable time from the Government in question, or if the statement when received is not deemed to be satisfactory by the Governing Body, the latter shall have the right to publish the representation and the statement, if any, made in reply to it.

"Article 411.

"Any of the Members shall have the right to file a complaint with the International Labour Office if it is not satisfied that any other Member is securing the effective observance of any convention which both have ratified in accordance with the foregoing Articles.

"The Governing Body may, if it thinks fit, before referring such a complaint to a Commission of Enquiry, as hereinafter provided for, communicate with the Government in question in the manner described in Article 409.

"If the Governing Body does not think it necessary to communicate the complaint to the Government in question, or if, when they have made such communication, no statement in reply has been received within a reasonable time which the Governing Body considers to be satisfactory, the Governing Body may apply for the appointment of a Commission of Enquiry to consider the complaint and to report thereon.

"The Governing Body may adopt the same procedure either of its own motion or on receipt of a complaint from a Delegate to the Conference.

"When any matter arising out of Articles 410 or 411 is being considered by the Governing Body, the Government in question shall, if not already represented thereon, be entitled to send a representative to take part in the proceedings of the Governing Body while the matter is under consideration. Adequate notice of the date on which the matter will be considered shall be given to the Government in question.

"Article 412.

"The Commission of Enquiry shall be constituted in accordance with the following provisions:

"Each of the Members agrees to nominate within six months of the date on which the present Treaty comes into force three persons of industrial experience, of whom one shall be a representative of employers, one a representative of workers, and one a person of independent standing, who shall together form a panel from which the Members of the Commission of Enquiry shall be drawn.

"The qualifications of the persons so nominated shall be subject to scrutiny by the Governing Body, which may by two-thirds of the votes cast by the representatives present refuse to accept the nomination of any person whose qualifications do not in its opinion comply with the requirements of the present Article.

"Upon the application of the Governing Body, the Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall nominate three persons, one from each section of this panel, to constitute the Commission of Enquiry, and shall designate one of them as the President of the Commission. None of these three persons shall be a person nominated to the panel by any Member directly concerned in the complaint.

"Article 413.

"The Members agree that, in the event of the reference of a complaint to a Commission of Enquiry under Article 411, they will each, whether directly concerned in the complaint or not, place at the disposal of the Commission all the information in their possession which bears upon the subject-matter of the complaint.

"Article 414.

"When the Commission of Enquiry has fully considered the complaint, it shall prepare a report embodying its findings on all questions of fact relevant to determining the issue between the parties and containing such recommendations as it may think proper as to the steps which should be taken to meet the complaint and the time within which they should be taken.

"It shall also indicate in this report the measures, if any, of an economic character against a defaulting Government which it considers to be appropriate, and which it considers other Governments would be justified in adopting.

"Article 415.

"The Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall communicate the report of the Commission of Enquiry to each of the Governments concerned in the complaint, and shall cause it to be published.

"Each of these Governments shall within one month inform the Secretary-General of the League of Nations whether or not it accepts the recommendations contained in the report of the Commission; and if not, whether it proposes to refer the complaint to the Permanent Court of International Justice of the League of Nations.

"Article 416.

"In the event of any Member failing to take the action required by Article 405, with regard to a recommendation or draft Convention, any other Member shall be entitled to refer the matter to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

"Article 417.

"The decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice in regard to a complaint or matter which has been referred to it in pursuance of Article 415 or Article 416 shall be final.

"Article 418.

"The Permanent Court of International Justice may affirm, vary or reverse any of the findings or recommendations of the Commission of Enquiry, if any, and shall in its decision indicate the measures, if any, of an economic character which it considers to be appropriate, and which other Governments would be justified in adopting against a defaulting Government.

"Article 419.

"In the event of any Member failing to carry out within the time specified the recommendations, if any, contained in the report of the Commission of Enquiry, or in the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice, as the case may be, any other Member may take against that Member the measures of an economic character indicated in the report of the Commission or in the decision of the Court as appropriate to the case.

"Article 420.

"The defaulting Government may at any time inform the Governing Body that it has taken the steps necessary to comply with the recommendations of the Commission of Enquiry or with those in the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice, as the case may be, and may request it to apply to the Secretary-General of the League to constitute a Commission of Enquiry to verify its contention. In this case the provisions of Articles 412, 413, 414, 415, 417 and 418 shall apply, and if the report of the Commission of Enquiry or the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice is in favour of the defaulting Government, the other Governments shall forthwith discontinue the measures of an economic character that they have taken against the defaulting Government.

"Chapter III.

"GENERAL.

"Article 421.

"The Members engage to apply conventions which they have ratified in accordance with the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty to their colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing:

"(1) Except where owing to the local conditions the convention is inapplicable, or

"(2) Subject to such modifications as may be necessary to adapt the convention to local conditions.

"And each of the Members shall notify to the International Labour Office the action taken in respect of each of its colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing.

"Article 422.

"Article 423.

"Arrangements for the convening and the organisation of the first meeting of the Conference will be made by the Government designated for the purpose in the said Annex. That Government shall be assisted in the preparation of the documents for submission to the Conference by an International Committee constituted as provided in the said Annex.

"The expenses of the first meeting and of all subsequent meetings held before the League of Nations has been able to establish a general fund, other than the expenses of Delegates and their advisers, will be borne by the Members in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

"Article 425.

"Until the League of Nations has been constituted all communications which under the provisions of the foregoing Articles should be addressed to the Secretary-General of the League will be preserved by the Director of the International Labour Office, who will transmit them to the Secretary-General of the League.

"Article 426.

"Section II.

"GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

"Article 427.

"The High Contracting Parties, recognising that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in Section I and associated with that of the League of Nations.

"They recognise that differences of climate, habits and customs, of economic opportunity and industrial tradition, make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment. But, holding as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

"Among these methods and principles, the following seem to the High Contracting Parties to be of special and urgent importance:

"First.—The guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

"Second.—The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

"Third.—The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

"Fourth.—The adoption of an eight hours day or a forty-eight hours week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

"Fifth.—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

"Sixth.—The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

"Seventh.—The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

"Eighth.—The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

"Ninth.—Each State should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

"Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the High Contracting Parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the League of Nations; and that, if adopted by the industrial communities who are members of the League, and safeguarded in practice by an adequate system of such inspection, they will confer lasting benefits upon the wage-earners of the world.

"PART XIV.

"GUARANTEES.

"Section 1.

"WESTERN EUROPE.

"Article 428.

"As a guarantee for the execution of the present Treaty by Germany, the German territory situated to the west of the Rhine, together with the bridgeheads, will be occupied by Allied and Associated troops for a period of fifteen years from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"Article 429.

"If the conditions of the present Treaty are faithfully carried out by Germany, the occupation referred to in Article 428 will be successively restricted as follows:

"(1) At the expiration of five years there will be evacuated: the bridgehead of Cologne and the territories north of a line running along the Ruhr, then along the railway Jülich, Duren, Euskirchen, Rheinbach, thence along the road Rheinbach to Sinzig, and reaching the Rhine at the confluence with the Ahr; the roads, railways and places mentioned above being excluded from the area evacuated.

"(2) At the expiration of ten years there will be evacuated: the bridgehead of Coblenz and the territories north of a line to be drawn from the intersection between the frontiers of Belgium, Germany and Holland, running about from 4 kilometres south of Aix la-Chapelle, then to and following the crest of Forst Gemünd, then east of the railway of the Urft Valley, then along Blankenheim, Valdorf, Dreis, Ulmen to and following the Moselle from Bremm to Nehren, then passing by Kappel and Simmern, then following the ridge of the heights between Simmern and the Rhine and reaching this river at Bacharach; all the places, valleys, roads and railways mentioned above being excluded from the area evacuated.

"(3) At the expiration of fifteen years there will be evacuated: the bridgehead of Mainz, the bridgehead of Kehl and the remainder of the German territory under occupation.

"If at that date the guarantees against unprovoked aggression by Germany are not considered sufficient by the Allied and Associated Governments, the evacuation of the occupying troops may be delayed to the extent regarded as necessary for the purpose of obtaining the required guarantees.

"Article 430.

"In case either during the occupation or after the expiration of the fifteen years referred to above the Reparation Commission finds that Germany refuses to observe the whole or part of her obligations under the present Treaty with regard to reparation, the whole or part of the areas specified in Article 429 will be reoccupied immediately by the Allied and Associated forces.

"Article 431.

"If before the expiration of the period of fifteen years Germany complies with all the undertakings resulting from the present Treaty, the occupying forces will be withdrawn immediately.

"Article 432.

"All matters relating to the occupation and not provided for by the present Treaty shall be regulated by subsequent agreements, which Germany hereby undertakes to observe.

"Section II.

"EASTERN EUROPE.

"Article 433.

"As a guarantee for the execution of the provisions of the present Treaty, by which Germany accepts definitely the abrogation of the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, and of all treaties, conventions and agreements entered into by her with the Maximalist Government in Russia, and in order to ensure the restoration of peace and good government in the Baltic Provinces and Lithuania, all German troops at present in the said territories shall return to within the frontiers of Germany as soon as the Governments of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers shall think the moment suitable, having regard to the internal situation of these territories. These troops shall abstain from all requisitions and seizures and from any other coercive measures, with a view to obtaining supplies intended for Germany, and shall in no way interfere with such measures for national defence as may be adopted by the Provisional Governments of Esthonia, Latvia and Lithuania.

"No other German troops shall, pending the evacuation or after the evacuation is complete, be admitted to the said territories.

"PART XV.

"MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

"Article 434.

"Germany undertakes to recognise the full force of the Treaties of Peace and Additional Conventions which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers with the Powers who fought on the side of Germany and to recognise whatever dispositions may be made concerning the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, of the Kingdom of Bulgaria and of the Ottoman Empire, and to recognise the new States within their frontiers as there laid down.

"Article 435.

"The High Contracting Parties, while they recognize the guarantees stipulated by the Treaties of 1815, and especially by the Act of November 20, 1815, in favour of Switzerland, the said guarantees constituting international obligations for the maintenance of peace, declare nevertheless that the provisions of these treaties, conventions, declarations and other supplementary Acts concerning the neutralized zone of Savoy, as laid down in paragraph 1 of Article 92 of the Final Act of the Congress of Vienna and in paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Treaty of Paris of November 20, 1815, are no longer consistent with present conditions. For this reason the High Contracting Parties take note of the agreement reached between the French Government and the Swiss Government for the abrogation of the stipulations relating to this zone which are and remain abrogated.

"The High Contracting Parties also agree that the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and of the other supplementary Acts concerning the free zones of Upper Savoy and the Gex district are no longer consistent with present conditions, and that it is for France and Switzerland to come to an agreement together with a view to settling between themselves the status of these territories under such conditions as shall be considered suitable by both countries.

"ANNEX.

"I.

"The Swiss Federal Council has informed the French Government on May 5, 1919, that after examining the provisions of Article 435 in a like spirit of sincere friendship it has happily reached the conclusion that it was possible to acquiesce in it under the following conditions and reservations:

"(1) The neutralized zone of Haute-Savoie:

"(a) It will be understood that as long as the Federal Chambers have not ratified the agreement come to between the two Governments concerning the abrogation of the stipulations in respect of the neutralized zone of Savoy, nothing will be definitely settled, on one side or the other, in regard to this subject.

"(b) The assent given by the Swiss Government to the abrogation of the above mentioned stipulations presupposes, in conformity with the text adopted, the recognition of the guarantees formulated in favour of Switzerland by the Treaties of 1815 and particularly by the Declaration of November 20, 1815.

"(c) The agreement between the Governments of France and Switzerland for the abrogation of the above mentioned stipulations will only be considered as valid if the Treaty of Peace contains this Article in its present wording. In addition the Parties to the Treaty of Peace should endeavour to obtain the assent of the signatory Powers of the Treaties of 1815 and of the Declaration of November 20, 1815, which are not signatories of the present Treaty of Peace.

"(2) Free zone of Haute-Savoie and the district of Gex:

"(a) The Federal Council makes the most express reservations to the interpretation to be given to the statement mentioned in the last paragraph of the above Article for insertion in the Treaty of Peace, which provides that 'the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and other supplementary acts concerning the free zones of Haute-Savoie and the Gex district are no longer consistent with present conditions.' The Federal Council would not wish that its acceptance of the above wording should lead to the conclusion that it would agree to the suppression of a system intended to give neighbouring territory the benefit of a special régime which is appropriate to the geographical and economical situation and which has been well tested.

"In the opinion of the Federal Council the question is not the modification of the customs system of the zones as set up by the Treaties mentioned above, but only the regulation in a manner more appropriate to the economic conditions of the present day of the terms of the exchange of goods between the regions in question. The Federal Council has been led to make the preceding observations by the perusal of the draft Convention concerning the future constitution of the zones which was annexed to the note of April 26 from the French Government. While making the above reservations the Federal Council declares its readiness to examine in the most friendly spirit any proposals which the French Government may deem it convenient to make on the subject.

(b) It is conceded that the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and other supplementary acts relative to the free zones will remain in force until a new arrangement is come to between France and Switzerland to regulate matters in this territory.

"II.

"The French Government have addressed to the Swiss Government, on May 18, 1919, the following note in reply to the communication set out in the preceding paragraph:

"In a note dated May 5 the Swiss Legation in Paris was good enough to inform the Government of the French Republic that the Federal Government adhered to the proposed Article to be inserted in the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Governments and Germany.

"The French Government have taken note with much pleasure of the agreement thus reached, and, at their request, the proposed Article, which had been accepted by the Allied and Associated Governments, has been inserted under No. 435 in the Peace conditions presented to the German Plenipotentiaries.

"The Swiss Government, in their note of May 5 on this subject, have expressed various views and reservations.

"Concerning the observations relating to the free zones of Haute-Savoie and the Gex district, the French Government have the honour to observe that the provisions of the last paragraph of Article 435 are so clear that their purport cannot be misapprehended, especially where it implies that no other Power but France and Switzerland will in future be interested in that question.

"The French Government, on their part, are anxious to protect the interests of the French territories concerned, and, with that object, having their special situation in view, they bear in mind the desirability of assuring them a suitable customs régime and determining, in a manner better suited to present conditions, the methods of exchanges between these territories and the adjacent Swiss territories, while taking into account the reciprocal interests of both regions.

"It is understood that this must in no way prejudice the right of France to adjust her customs line in this region in conformity with her political frontier, as is done on the other portions of her territorial boundaries, and as was done by Switzerland long ago on her own boundaries in this region.

"The French Government are pleased to note on this subject in what a friendly disposition the Swiss Government take this opportunity of declaring their willingness to consider any French proposal dealing with the system to be substituted for the present régime of the said free zones, which the French Government intend to formulate in the same friendly spirit.

"Moreover, the French Government have no doubt that the provisional maintenance of the régime of 1815 as to the free zones referred to in the above mentioned paragraph of the note from the Swiss Legation of May 5, whose object is to provide for the passage from the present régime to the conventional régime, will cause no delay whatsoever in the establishment of the new situation which has been found necessary by the two Governments. This remark applies also to the ratification by the Federal Chambers, dealt with in paragraph 1 (a), of the Swiss note of May 5, under the heading 'Neutralized zone of Haute-Savoie'.

"Article 436.

"The High Contracting Parties declare and place on record that they have taken note of the Treaty signed by the Government of the French Republic on July 17, 1918, with His Serene Highness the Prince of Monaco defining the relations between France and the Principality.

"Article 437.

"The High Contracting Parties agree that, in the absence of a subsequent agreement to the contrary, the Chairman of any Commission established by the present Treaty shall in the event of an equality of votes be entitled to a second vote.

"Article 438.

"The Allied and Associated Powers agree that where Christian religious missions were being maintained by German societies or persons in territory belonging to them, or of which the government is entrusted to them in accordance with the present Treaty, the property which these missions or missionary societies possessed, including that of trading societies whose profits were devoted to the support of missions, shall continue to be devoted to missionary purposes. In order to ensure the due execution of this undertaking the Allied and Associated Governments will hand over such property to boards of trustees appointed by or approved by the Governments and composed of persons holding the faith of the Mission whose property is involved.

"The Allied and Associated Governments, while continuing to maintain full control as to the individuals by whom the Missions are conducted, will safeguard the interests of such Missions.

"Germany, taking note of the above undertaking, agrees to accept all arrangements made or to be made by the Allied or Associated Government concerned for carrying on the work of the said missions or trading societies and waives all claims on their behalf.

"Article 439.

"Without prejudice to the provisions of the present Treaty, Germany undertakes not to put forward directly or indirectly against any Allied or Associated Power, signatory of the present Treaty, including those which without having declared war, have broken off diplomatic relations with the German Empire, any pecuniary claim based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of the present Treaty.

"The present stipulation will bar completely and finally all claims of this nature, which will be thenceforward extinguished, whoever may be the parties in interest.

"Article 440.

"Germany accepts and recognises as valid and binding all decrees and orders concerning German shops and goods and all orders relating to the payment of costs made by any Prize Court of any of the Allied or Associated Powers, and undertakes not to put forward any claim arising out of such decrees or orders on behalf of any German national.

"The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to examine in such manner as they may determine all decisions and orders of German Prize Courts, whether affecting the property rights of nationals of those Powers or of neutral Powers. Germany agrees to furnish copies of all the documents constituting the record of the cases, including the decisions and orders made, and to accept and give effect to the recommendations made after such examination of the cases.

"THE PRESENT TREATY, of which the French and English texts are both authentic, shall be ratified.

"The deposit of ratifications shall be made at Paris as soon as possible.

"Powers of which the seat of the Government is outside Europe will be entitled merely to inform the Government of the French Republic through their diplomatic representative at Paris that their ratification has been given; in that case they must transmit the instrument of ratification as soon as possible.

"A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the Treaty has been ratified by Germany on the one hand, and by three of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on the other hand.

"From the date of this first procès-verbal the Treaty will come into force between the High Contracting Parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present Treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the Treaty.

"In all other respects the Treaty will enter into force for each Power at the date of the deposit of its ratification.

"The French Government will transmit to all the signatory Powers a certified copy of the procès-verbaux of the deposit of ratifications.

"IN FAITH WHEREOF the above-named Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty.

"Done at Versailles, the twenty-eighth day of june, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, in a single copy which will remain deposited in the archives of the French Republic, and of which authenticated copies will be transmitted to each of the Signatory Powers."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate now return to the first amendment which was passed over.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment, known as the Johnson amendment, on page 19——

Mr. LODGE. The amendment has been read. It is not necessary to read it again.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I understand that a number of Senators desire to address the Senate on the Johnson amendment. I think I myself should like to make a few remarks upon it. They believed, however, as I believed, that the reading of the treaty would occupy all of the afternoon, and I do not know of any Senator who is now prepared to address the Senate. Under those conditions, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if it would not suit his convenience to adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. Several Senators who have spoken to me desire to go on to-morrow, but it is necessary to have a morning hour. I intended to move a recess, but I find that it is absolutely necessary that the Senate should have a morning hour to-morrow for the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which is now ready, and has been reported to the Senate to-day. It is a bill which ought to be disposed of in the morning hour at once. For that reason, instead of moving a recess, I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, October 21, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, October 20, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, inspire, we pray Thee, the heart of every American citizen with a profounder reverence for our National Constitution, which for a hundred and thirty-two years has guided us to unparalleled prosperity; and arouse a patriotism which shall sweep through our Republic as never before, to still unholy strife, eliminate lawlessness and unrest; a patriotism which shall drive the agitator, the Bolshevist, the dynamiter, and all foreign vagaries from our borders, that loyalty, peace, and good will may reign supreme. In the name of Him who taught us how to live and enjoy the fruits of liberty, justice, mercy, and worship Thee, our Father, in the beauty of holiness. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

RECEPTION TO THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution and ask that it may be read for the information of the House. I shall then ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman does not ask for its consideration now?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I ask that it be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Tuesday, October 28, 1919, at 1.45 o'clock p. m., the House take a recess until 2.30 o'clock p. m. for the purpose of receiving His Majesty the King of the Belgians.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if this is the only recess we are going to get before the regular session?

Mr. MONDELL. I trust not; I trust that there will be another, beginning about the 8th or the 10th of November.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I hope nobody will object to the consideration of this resolution. The King of the Belgians is about the only one of the crowd that deserves the cordial greetings of the American people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9783, the budget bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9783) to provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts, and for other purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am informed that at 1 o'clock there will be a drill on the plaza in front of the Capitol of what is known as "The All-American Platoon," a body of soldiers all of whom are foreign born, all of whom a few months ago could speak no English and could not understand an order in English. They will appear this afternoon at 1 o'clock, and it occurred to me that Members might desire to see them drill.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman plan to ask for a recess?

Mr. MONDELL. No; in view of the fact that the House has an important piece of legislation before it, and that it will require all the afternoon and the attention of the House the entire day, I shall not ask for a recess.

Mr. GARD. If we do not recess, the Members will all be out in front of the Capitol.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; I think some gentlemen will be here.

Mr. BLANTON. The usual 20 will be here. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, Saturday night, just before adjournment, I had yielded 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, as I may not be able to complete my remarks, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend them in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I concur very heartily with the general provisions of this bill. There are some points, perchance, to which important amendments should be made, but I shall not dwell particularly on those at the present, because they can be taken up more properly at a later date.

In the first section of the bill we have a proposition for the creation of a bureau of the budget, with a director and an assistant director, at $10,000 and $7,500, respectively, for salaries. I may say in passing that I believe this work can be done with a salary for the director equal to that of a Member of the House or Senate, and that an amendment should be made reducing the salary from $10,000 to $7,500, and in view of salaries paid throughout the departments for services of a like character in the main the assistant director's salary should be fixed at $5,000.

Passing now to the question of the real work of the bureau of the budget, I desire to suggest that we should not deceive ourselves in advance with reference to great economies by the existence of such a bureau. If we could realize even a small percentage of the reduction prophesied by some of its enthusiastic advocates we would still be doing well. I am confident that there is a margin of saving here sufficient to justify the creation of the bureau.

But I am reminded of a little incident that happened some years ago when a particular gentleman who had mastered the world outside, and was ready to conquer the department and demonstrate to all observing people his remarkable financial ability, came into the Treasury as Assistant Secretary. One of our versatile newspaper men wrote up the incident somewhat as follows. He described the newcomer as the greenest piece of political grass that ever came out of a great city in a Pullman drawing room for the National Capital to direct the financial affairs of the Nation.

In the midst of the first day of official service he is said to have propounded more questions than all the wisest old-timers could ever answer. They were surprised and puzzled. Many of his questions related to things that belonged to the department, but many more related to things that did not belong to the department at all.

On the next morning he entered the office, and the report of the newspaper correspondent says he sat for a few moments in quiet meditation. Those about him began to fear for his welfare. They thought, perchance, that the great official's responsibilities resting upon him had so overtaxed him that his mind was about to give way. In a minute or two he sprang from his chair, rushed to the office of the Secretary, and pointed out to the Secretary where they could save $50,000 a year.

The next day he called upon the Secretary early in the morning and told him where he could save half a million dollars. Then he showed where he could save a million dollars, and on the third day he proved to the Secretary conclusively that he could run the Treasury Department without a cent of appropriation. In a short time that brilliant financial life passed on to wider fields. The observers were relieved, however, when he disappeared and became interested in private matters elsewhere. Here is an illustration of many of the ambitious thoughts and purposes that find their way into the department life to revolutionize everything in a day. Many of the fundamental rules of the great departments have been developed through years of experience. Most of them run along lines well defined and well fixed. In most of them there are practical economies. In some of them there are extravagances, and it is our purpose to search out as far as we may these extravagances to eliminate them and apply practical economy.

In the discussion of this subject and the cost of the bureau naturally we wish to keep our minds upon that phase of the question. I think we have heard quite a number of men say in the course of the debate here that they are opposed to the creation of new bureaus; that they are in favor of reducing the number we already have. When, therefore, there is a proposition to build up a new one we should know quite well what the range of its usefulness and practical value is. In determining that let us look for a moment at the scope of this work. The committee has indicated in paragraph (c) of section 1 of this bill an appropriation of $100,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. That means $100,000 for six months.

On that basis the committee suggests a cost of $200,000 a year for the running expenses of this bureau. This, however, in the light of the suggestions made by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] is merely the nose of the camel under the tent. The strongest argument that I have heard yet against this bill was suggested by the gentleman from Oregon. I am sorry that I do not see him on the floor now. By and by I wish to call his attention to that and make sure whether the estimate he then made was accurate or an accident. The committee suggests, as I have indicated, the measure of cost at $200,000 annually for the bureau. What did the gentleman from Oregon say? He said that they could not place the bureau within the Treasury Department and make it a part of that department without practically paralyzing the business of that department because of the volume of work that this bureau would be obliged to perform. Immediately I turned to some figures to ascertain what the running expenses of the Treasury Department for its offices here in Washington might be. In 1913 the expenses of that department on the general salary roll were $3,341,000. Do we want, without further debate, to create a bureau that will cost $3,341,000? If so, where will it direct its energies to make a saving that will be equivalent to that expenditure? I am quite sure that that statement of $3,341,000 is incorrect. I am confident from years of observation that all of the additional work for a budget bureau can be performed inside of the Treasury Department for $75,000 a year. Others may think differently. I base this statement upon a careful review of the expense accounts and the activities of the various bureaus of the department and the method in which estimates have been made up heretofore. True, since I have had direct observation of these matters, other methods may have come into existence.

Let me sketch for just a moment some of the plans that were in vogue when I was required to take part in making up the estimates for the Treasury Department and for other departments. As suggested by others in these debates, each bureau officer is supplied at regular times each year with blanks upon which to prepare the estimates of his bureau. He is called upon by the head of the department to make those estimates along the lines of absolute necessity. He fills out the blank and sends it up to the Secretary of the Treasury. After they have all been turned in from the various branches of the department, they go into the hands of a committee for revision. Sometimes I chanced to be a member of the committee handling that kind of work. They review them and, wherever new estimates were furnished for new activities, investigations were made with respect to the necessity for the increases. In many instances those estimates were returned to the heads of the bureaus and they were called upon to reduce them, and in many instances they did, and I venture the prediction that the reductions thus made by these officers in the Treasury Department—and other departments were similar at that time—amounted to as much as the reductions made by the committees on appropriations in the House and in the Senate. They were eliminated from the list, new forms were prepared before they were entered into the printed estimates to go to Congress. I do not mean to say that there were not overdrawn statements in some instances. Whether you have a bureau of the budget or whether you proceed according to the plan that I have described, you will have to go to the heads of these bureaus for these facts in the beginning. No director of the budget, no clerks or officials in the budget bureau, can do that work, and it would be unwise, impractical, to undertake it.

That would mean that you would have people coming from an outside agency into each bureau to analyze the needs of the work of each individual desk and each line of expenditure in that bureau. That would mean a budget that might cost more than $3,341,000. That would be duplication, and we are standing here to prevent duplication, as I understand it. So I do not see the necessity of the largeness of the bureau, as suggested by the gentleman from Oregon, that would take practically the force now on the rolls of the Treasury Department to do this work. I think the estimate of the committee for $100,000 for the first six months stands quite in contrast with the estimate as furnished by the gentleman from Oregon, and I put these two statements in contrast simply to show the wide divergence of opinion that is bound to appear in dealing with a question of such magnitude and such complication. It is no small task to analyze this business. Moreover, if the Secretary of the Treasury, as a member of the President's Cabinet, in touch with the financial affairs of the Government, is not reliable and competent to do this business in the interest of an economical administration for his chief, how can we expect it from a director of the budget?

Let us think for a minute about the matter of direct responsibility. How much more securely would an independent bureau of this kind fix the responsibility upon the President than the action of a member of the Cabinet would? How far can the President go into these details? Practically nothing is possible under the circumstances. If the Secretary of the Treasury, with only one department under his charge, is not able to do this work efficiently, how can you expect the President to find time for it, when he has the whole range of the Government to deal with? So, when it comes to the final analysis, I am inclined to the opinion that the independent bureau will not accomplish any special advantage in the line of economy but will be more expensive than it would be if provided for inside of the Treasury.

Under paragraph (b) of section 2 emphasis is placed on certain detailed work to be done by the bureau of the budget in making investigations extensively into the various branches of the public service. To carry out the duties there imposed you have a wide range of duplication of service. A few months of observation in the department will reveal that fact very clearly.

Coming now to section 3, permanent appropriations, fixing estimates, let us get the bearing with reference to the general types of appropriations to be handled by this budget bureau. We have the annual appropriations which cover the major part of the Government expenditures. We have what are called permanent appropriations with fixed amounts, such, for instance, as those set apart for public buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Then we have what we call the permanent indefinite appropriations, out of which the refunds from customs duties are made and the refunds from internal-revenue tax collections are made. I will pass that with a mere mention, taking up, for instance, section 4; and right there I find one of the best features in the bill. This budget bureau shall furnish the Congress balanced statements of revenues and expenditures. That is a new feature. That is essential information to the Members of the House and the Senate in the proper discharge of their duties in voting appropriations. With a debit and credit statement clearly in view, we can measure our course of action in distributing appropriations.

As it is now we are working in the dark. No one, except those on the committees which have given special attention to the subject, can state the unappropriated funds still in the Treasury on which additional appropriations may be drawn. If we have a statement in clear view as to the total revenues and the estimated expenditures side by side you have one of the strongest forces and arguments to press down unwise and unnecessary appropriation. To illustrate, a certain committee may be thoroughly imbued with the necessity of certain public improvements. They may be highly commendable. They bring in a bill authorizing the expenditure of a million dollars, for illustration. The House passes it. Another committee presents another proposition, and then another and another, nobody knowing what the volume of unappropriated funds in the Treasury may be at the time, but with these balanced statements of revenues and appropriations we will have a picture before us, and thus we can guard against any of the appropriations that would otherwise be made. Now, lest my time should expire too suddenly I shall direct my attention to the other provision of this bill, beginning with section 9, providing for an accounting department. I wish we could find a more suitable word than the word "department." The word "bureau" is more commonly used for purposes of this kind. In this section we are laying a foundation for the largest measure of economy that can be realized under this bill. Why? Because the accounting officers of the Government can go out into these various channels, gather the facts and submit them. The contracts and the vouchers upon which public money is expended will be available for the House and the Senate. When anyone rises on the floor then to challenge some course of procedure all we need to do is to go and get the contracts and the vouchers and review the official record upon which the disbursement has been made. Suppose we had that record now for all of these expenditures for the War Department, contracts amounting to billions of dollars, expenditures through disbursing officers amounting to billions more.

When a committee on expenditures needs to ascertain the facts now you can call in these accounting officers, the men who know the facts from the examination of the record. They can bring the contracts and the vouchers, and you will have trained service to begin with. How is it now? When you start out on that kind of work you go and employ some so-called expert accountant, who may not know the alphabet of the accounting system of the Government of the United States. You pay him a big price—perhaps $20 or $30 a day—to go down there and learn something about the Government's business. You are paying him that salary to educate him, and how could you rely upon the facts that are brought back by a person of that kind? On the other hand, you will have under this plan officers of the Government, subject to the call of the House and the Senate, to come and lay the facts upon the table, point out the record, and show what the situation is. Right there you can economize; right there you can press in closer upon the expenditures of the Government; right there you can deal fairly and justly with everybody. With that plan you do not have to pound the brush to see whether you can scare up something or not. You have a practical business rule of action by means of which you can deal with the question. It is proposed that these accounting officers shall be covered into the Government for life, with salaries aggregating $43,500. In all probability the same men who are doing the work now would go into the service under this bill. You would be legislating eight people into the service, giving life tenures with salaries amounting to $43,500, and two of them to draw half pay after they reach the age of 70 years, provided they have served 10 years. That is a point where I think there ought to be some amendments, and no doubt they will appear. The concluding portion of the bill relates to the efficiency of the accounting system. Under existing conditions you can not build up an efficient force of accounting officers. They have people in the service now, a few of them, not many, who do not understand the accounting system. They never will; they never can understand it. It is not in their nature to understand it; but the auditors can not dispose of those clerks. I will not take the time now to tell you why.

If I had plenty of time I would enter into that story; it is a very interesting one. This bill requires the Civil Service Commission to establish eligible registers for the examination of applicants for appointment as accountants. The questions must be approved by the comptroller general himself. Why? Because the examinations ordinarily prescribed by that commission are not suitable for testing practical accountants. They do not bear upon the business to be transacted. This plan, however, provides that the examination of accountants shall be made upon questions prescribed by the comptroller general, and on that basis you can begin to build up a standard of efficiency.

EFFICIENCY.

This idea of efficiency is an indispensable factor in correct accounting. The primary duty of the accounting system is to enforce a strict observance of legal methods in the collection and disbursement of public revenues.

The proper discharge of that duty makes it necessary for the officers and clerks intrusted with that business to possess clear, accurate knowledge of statutes, regulations, and methods of public business. These facts can not be repeated too frequently or emphasized too strongly, because a great many public officials act upon the assumption that the accounting offices are chiefly, if not exclusively, engaged in the posting of debits and credits that have been previously journalized by some one else. They do not seem to think that a knowledge of law, regulations, and Government business is of any consequence whatever. But whether they do or not those who are charged with the development of ways and means to promote the efficiency of the service should take into account actual conditions and facts and formulate plans accordingly.

The present accounting system is based upon the idea of a double examination or audit. One examination is to be made in the administrative offices that have jurisdiction of the expenditures of the various appropriations, and are therefore in possession of the actual information concerning all of the details involved in the creation of liabilities and the needs of the various branches of the public service. The final examination or audit is made in an auditing office, with the right of an appeal to the Comptroller of the Treasury as the chief accounting officer. If the conditions that are logically involved in the present system are given due weight and consideration, trained accounting clerks will be secured for the administrative offices and also the auditing offices in order that accounts may be built up correctly under the laws and regulations and be examined finally by other accounting clerks in the auditing offices who are supposed to be trained to that particular line of business. It is a fact, however, that this subject has not yet received the consideration which it deserves. Until it does, the matter of public accounting is bound to carry within itself a large measure of inefficiency. The most important improvements that could be made at this time are (1) the establishment of eligible registers with the Civil Service Commission for trained public accountants and (2) the adoption of an inflexible rule requiring that all clerks appointed to the work of the examination of public accounts should be certified by the Civil Service Commission as trained accountants. The nature of this business is too important to be pressed aside to serve the mere exigency of accommodating some person with a place who has no knowledge of the work of accounting or adaptability for it. It is useless to talk about the discharge of people from the rolls of the auditing offices who are not properly equipped for such service until the appointments of such persons upon those rolls cease.

The way in which to meet the situation, remove the difficulties, and improve the service is to adopt and enforce an inflexible rule with respect to the appointment of accounting clerks. Eligible registers have been established for other things, but the work of accounting seems to have received no more consideration than the ordinary routine affairs of clerical service. The accounting clerk who examines all the questions of law, regulations, and facts upon which a correct journal entry is based receives less consideration in point of salary than the individual who takes that journal entry and does the simple work of posting it into the ledger. This practice is wrong, not because the bookkeeper who posts the journal entry may receive a larger salary than the accounting clerk who determines all of the intricate questions involved in the journal entries, but because the accounting clerk does not receive a salary commensurate with the importance and value of his service.

If an eligible register of accountants should be established and this office, for instance, should be allowed a certain number of accountants at the different grades, classes 1, 2, 3, and 4, selections would then be made from persons who already possess some knowledge of the business. Under this plan, those who have never studied the work of accounting would be ineligible for appointment as accountants. In this way the classified service would become helpful to the accounting offices.

Every well-informed person knows that accounting clerks should possess and exercise skill and knowledge peculiar to that kind of work. They must be familiar with the statutes creating the accounting system and prescribing the legal methods of procedure to be observed in the examination and settlement of public accounts. They must possess a thorough knowledge of the laws of contracts and the statutes that are involved from time to time in the conduct of public business. In the customs service, for instance, the work calls for accurate knowledge of tariff schedules and rates, the customs administrative laws, and numerous other statutes as construed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Board of General Appraisers, and the courts. Those laws and decisions are complex in character and their proper construction and application require a high degree of skill on the part of the clerks who handle over $500,000,000 of business annually, keep it within legal channels, and direct it through all the ramifications of the public service to its correct places upon the ledgers of the department. It is erroneous to assume that such business involves merely the question of posting debits and credits previously ascertained by somebody else. Years of careful study and thorough training are necessary to qualify clerks to discharge such duties efficiently, economically, and in keeping with the public welfare.

Numerous lines of public business will be readily recalled in addition to the customs service, if extended argument should be needed in support of this proposition. Efficiency can not be secured and economy can not be promoted effectively unless these important facts are taken into account and given full consideration and weight in the selection of clerks for the work of the accounting offices.

INDEPENDENT ORGANIZATION.

After extended study and observation of this branch of public business I am fully convinced that the accounting system of the Government will never reach its highest degree of efficiency and economy until the accounting offices become an independent organization with the comptroller at its head.

But this question must be viewed from the administrative standpoint also.

ADMINISTRATIVE EXAMINATION OF ACCOUNTS.

Section 22 of the act of July 31, 1894 (28 Stat., p. 211), is mandatory with respect to the administrative examination of accounts.

Section 14 of the same act, page 210, makes provision for exceptional cases.

The phrase "proper administrative examination of accounts" has received numerous interpretations and applications. The office that manifests a commendable pride in systematic accounting seems to have no trouble in understanding the correct meaning of the phrase, but the office that is willing that its accounts may pass along with negligence and indifference seems to interpret that phrase according to its own inclinations, which are foreign to systematic accounting. It is not uncommon to find conflicting interpretations placed upon it by different committees composed of persons claiming to be expert accountants.

It is earnestly hoped and believed that the method of administrative bookkeeping recently prescribed by the department will assist very greatly in removing many of the difficulties heretofore experienced in connection with the administrative examination of accounts.

Every account, whether it belongs to the species called claims or not, should bear official evidence showing that the proper administrative office has considered the matter and has forwarded to the auditor all the material information it has in regard to the correctness or incorrectness of the account. In this way the administrative offices and the accounting offices can cooperate with one another in reducing all mistakes to the lowest possible point and advancing the efficiency of the service to the highest point.

But what constitutes a proper administrative examination? What does it really involve and require?

The legislative history of these statutes will assist us very materially in answering this question correctly.

House Report 637, Fifty-third Congress, second session, submitted by Mr. Dingley, of Maine, bears directly upon this question. It shows that "administrative officers should examine and approve these accounts coming under their control before they go to the auditor."

In the second paragraph of page 3 of that report the following statement appears:

To guard against the possibility of collusion in the settlement of the few classes of claims which have not had a previous examination and approval by an administrative officer, the auditor is required to submit such claims to two clerks to examine independently, and a favorable report is required from both to settle the same.

It is evident that two independent audits are required, the first by the proper administrative officer and the second by the proper auditor.

Thus the existing law clearly requires a double examination or audit in the settlement of public accounts.

The following extracts are quoted from pages 4349 to 4350 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-third Congress, second session:

There should be a double audit of all the expenditures of the Government, whether they be claims or accounts, whether the audit be made after disbursement or prior to payment. A double audit is essential to mathematical accuracy and a correct interpretation of statutes.

Conceding as we (the committee) do, that there should be a joint double audit, the question arises, Who shall make that audit?

It is contended by the gentlemen who are opposed to this bill that the administrative audit under the present triplicate system of examination should be abolished and accounts and claims sent directly to the auditor whose examination should be reviewed by a comptroller. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that an administrative examination is of paramount importance. Congress commits to the administrative departments the expenditures of large sums of money, much of which in its detail is necessarily a matter of regulations by administrative departments.

It follows, therefore, that these departments should supervise and examine expenditures they have authorized in order to determine that they have been made in accordance with laws and regulations and that the amounts are correctly stated.

If the administrative departments are to enforce economy in the administration of the public service, then there is no escape from the conclusion that they must supervise and review the expenditures they have made. (Mr. Dockery.)

Page 4350, Secretary Carlisle's letter contains the following:

About 90 per cent of all the expenditures of the Government other than those from postal revenues are made through responsible disbursing agents, and their accounts will be carefully audited by the administrative departments of the Government before going to the auditors.

This method, together with the requirements that all claims which do not receive an administrative audit, shall have two independent examinations in the auditor's offices, constitute a complete check.

Page 4337, Mr. Dingley said:

All accounts before going to the proper auditor must first be examined and approved by the head of the department which made or authorized the expenditure. This secures two separate and independent examinations of accounts.

The act reorganizing the accounting offices of the Treasury Department was approved July 31, 1894.

On March 2, 1895, Mr. Dockery submitted, on behalf of the joint commission, a report concerning the reorganization of the accounting system of the Treasury Department.

That House Report 2000, Fifty-third Congress, third session, contains the following on pages 25, 26, and 27:

Addressing the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Dingley says:

We want to inquire of you how the new accounting system has been working since the 1st of October and whether you have kept a special eye on that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the system is working admirably. The Secretary recently asked me to represent him in that matter and to notice any facts that might arise under the comparison of efficiency in the department.

The Assistant Secretary summarized the question of a double examination or audit in the following words:

There is as complete an audit in each bureau of the War Department, Navy Department, Interior Department, and the other departments of the Government as would be found in any corporation or commercial house in the world. The new system provides that after this complete audit by the administrative departments the accounts should be passed upon thoroughly by an auditor. This makes a complete double check. (P. 26, last paragraph.)

Thus it is clearly shown that an administrative examination involves the same degree of scrutiny and thoroughness that an examination would exact in an auditing office. It will be observed that the authors of the law gave the same meaning to the words "examine," "examination," with respect to an administrative office, that they did in regard to the auditing office. An administrative examination involves the same kind of work in an administrative office that it does in an auditing office. It will be observed that the authors of this law frequently used the expression "administrative audit," also "joint audit," meaning thereby one and the same thing for the administrative and the auditing offices. It will also be observed that Mr. Dockery, chairman of the commission, and also Mr. Dingley placed special stress upon the fact that the double audit of claims should be required before or after payment.

On the basis of this bill you can reach out to the business colleges of the country, the business high schools of the country, and induce them to put these fundamental questions into their courses of study. Thus in a short time the Government will be able to secure men and women who are educated for this work before they come here. As it is now, you pay them salaries while they learn the business. On the plan proposed in this bill you will be able to obtain trained service at the very outset, and that principle will lift the accounting system to a grade of efficiency that will challenge the commendations of all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to use the time allotted me in discussing a feature of the budget system relatively unimportant as regards legislation but one concerning which, in my opinion, it is pertinent to inquire at this time. I should like to make a brief statement and then predicate upon it one or two questions to members of the committee.

I realize that this is a subject of general legislation, and that perhaps it would not be proper or advisable to seek to include in it matters of detailed procedure in the manner of the preparation of the budget. The primary dual purpose of the proposed act is evidently to foster and promote economy and to discover and prevent duplication both in governmental effort and governmental expenditure. Conflicting claims and overlapping of functions is an expensive incident of our administrative system.

I note that one of the witnesses who testified before the committee was Dr. W. F. Willoughby, director of the Institute for Government Research. In his book on the problem of a national budget he states as his opinion that data regarding the cost of governmental operations should be submitted from at least five distinct standpoints, namely: Funds, organization units, activities, character of expenditure, and object of expenditure. These terms are largely self-explanatory.

It seems to me that the adoption of some such method as that here suggested will likely insure economy by enabling the discovery of duplication and extravagance. Of course, this is a matter of accounting and is relatively unimportant, but it is intensely practical. I feel, therefore, that it is not really a digression to call attention to this feature of the matter. As Dr. Willoughby has stated, "No satisfactory budget system can be established unless the proper basis for such a system is laid in the adoption of a scheme of expenditure documents and accounting practices calculated to produce the information which must be furnished by a budget if it is fully to serve its purpose as an information document."

Section 4 of this bill provides that the budget shall contain balanced statements of the revenues and expenditures of the Government. Nevertheless, we could be supplied with a balanced statement which would not reveal the real sources of extravagance and duplication and which would not properly present the opportunities for economy.

Though this is not directly a part of our proposed legislation, it seems to me that it is a very important incident, and I believe that in an effort to get a comprehensive idea of the program it is not crossing the bridge before we get to it to inquire of the committee whether or not it has considered this practical matter. For the information of myself and the Committee of the Whole House I have risen to inquire about this feature of the system. Is this practical phase of the question to be left to the arbitrary judgment of one man? I for one should like to be advised of the method in the contemplation of the Budget Committee. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the last 25 or 30 years there has been an alarming increase in the cost of government in the United States, both in the Federal Government and in our State and municipal governments. This increase has been so progressive that it has become alarming and is now challenging the earnest consideration of thoughtful men charged with administration of government in the States and in the Nation.

Some 20 years ago I had the honor of serving as a member of the legislature of my State. The total appropriations for the State government for a period of two years at that time had reached the sum of thirteen millions. And I remember what an outcry was made by a portion of the press of our State and the leaders of the opposition party, when that legislature adjourned, against its extravagance and wastefulness. That was 20 years ago. Thirteen million dollars at that time was sufficient to finance all the departments of the government of the great State of Illinois for two years. In less than four years from that time the expenses of government in our State had gone up to $20,000,000 for two years. In 1912, at the close of the administration of Mr. Deneen, the legislature had appropriated for the last two years of his administration the sum of $29,000,000. That enormous appropriation became an issue more or less in the 1912 campaign in Illinois. Our Democratic friends said that was wasteful and extravagant, and that if they were given charge of the State government they would cut down expenditures and reduce the taxes, with which the people of the State were burdened. A Democratic legislature and a Democratic governor came into power in 1912. There is no question but that they were acting in good faith in the criticism they had made of these expenditures and fully intended to cut down appropriations, but, to the surprise of themselves and everyone concerned in the State government in our State, the first legislature under that administration increased the appropriations to $39,000,000. In the next two years, the last half of the administration of Gov. Dunne, the appropriations reached the sum of $45,000,000, and the Republicans made that an issue in the campaign of 1916, namely, that the appropriations had unnecessarily been increased in four years from $39,000,000 to $45,000,000. And the Republican Party came back into power. However, the appropriations at the very next session of the legislature were increased, and I think necessarily so.

And that has been the history of all the States. It has likewise been the history of all the counties and cities of the United States. I see it stated in the hearings that in the great State of New York in 30 years the cost of government had increased 600 per cent, while the assessed valuation of the State had only increased 300 per cent and the population 30 per cent.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will.

Mr. ALMON. Did the population of the State of Illinois and the value of property and the assessed value of property increase in proportion to the increased appropriations to which you have just referred?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir. The increase in appropriations was entirely out of proportion to the increase in wealth and population. In 25 years our increase in appropriations in Illinois amounted to between 400 and 500 per cent. Our population probably about doubled in that time, and our increase in wealth was from 250 to 300 per cent. But I was speaking about the State of New York, where the expense of government in 30 years has increased 600 per cent and the property valuation of the State 300 per cent. That is out of all proportion, it seems to me, and presents a question demanding the very best thought of men charged with the government of that State, as do the constantly increasing appropriations of the Federal Government demand the best thought of men charged with the management of our Federal Government.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. You would not have us understand that that was entirely extravagance on the part of the government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not say so.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Is it because they are getting more by way of benefit in the shape of high schools and better roads and better asylums all along the line?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The States and the Federal Government have entered upon many new activities that require vast sums of money, but, with all that, the expenses of government are increasing at a ratio such that, unless it can be stopped, will reach a point where the burden will be too heavy to be borne by the people.

As to the Federal Government, the appropriations increased in the 40-year period from 1877 to 1917 more than 500 per cent. Let us begin with the administration of President Hayes, 40 years ago. At that time we had 45,000,000 population. I find that the total expenditures, the entire appropriations, of the Congress for the first year of his administration—that is, for the year ending July 1, 1878—were only $88,356,938.13. At the present time we pass deficiency bills carrying larger sums than were appropriated by the Congress for that entire year. The next year the appropriations increased to $172,016,809.21; and we find that for the entire four-year period of the Hayes administration the total appropriations amounted to the modest sum of $578,609,236.42. My honored colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who is present with us to-day, was a Member of the House of Representatives at that time, and yet he has lived to see in his own lifetime and during his service in Congress the appropriations for the operation of the Federal Government increase more than 500 per cent.

In the administration of Garfield and Arthur, the next four-year period, the total appropriations for the entire four years amounted to $756,370,081.37, an increase of $177,760,744.95 over the four-year period preceding.

In Mr. Cleveland's first administration the total appropriations for the entire four-year period were only $818,323,530.53, which was an increase of $61,953,449.16, a less increase than had been made in the former four-year period.

Coming on down to the administration of President Harrison, the total appropriations for that four-year period reached the sum of $1,134,331,204.87. It was the first time in the history of the Nation, except during the period of the Civil War, that we had reached the point where we had expended more than a billion dollars under a single administration. An increase was noted in this administration of $316,007,674.34 over the expenditures of the first administration of Mr. Cleveland, a very large increase.

In Mr. Cleveland's second administration, which ended in 1897, we find the total appropriations $1,226,644,157.19, or an increase of $92,312,952.32 over the Harrison administration.

We then come to the McKinley administration, with the extraordinary expenditures growing out of the Spanish War, and we find that, even including all the expenditures of that war, the total appropriations of the Government for the four-year period were only $1,903,894,744.42, an increase of $677,250,587.23, which was largely on account of the Spanish-American War.

Under Mr. Roosevelt's first administration the appropriations reached $1,897,811,351.83, an increase of $6,083,392.59 over the administration of Mr. McKinley, which conducted the war. Under Mr. Roosevelt's second term, which ended in 1909, the total appropriations for the entire period were $2,221,931,711.46, an increase of $324,120,359.63 over the previous four years of his first administration.

When we come to the administration of President Taft we find the total appropriations of the Government reaching the sum of $2,563,849,210.84, or an increase of $341,917,499.38 over the last administration of President Roosevelt. It might be noted here that Mr. Roosevelt's second administration was the first administration in the history of the Government, except Mr. Lincoln's, during the Civil War, where our expenditures reached the sum total of $2,000,000,000 and upwards.

We have next the first administration of Mr. Wilson, where the total appropriations reached the sum of $3,216,841,723.11, an increase of $652,992,512.27, which was largely accounted for, as we all know, by the preparedness measures that were passed by Congress.

We find that from 1877 down to 1917, a period of 40 years, the expenditures for operation of the Federal Government have increased more than 500 per cent. This certainly is a most startling fact, and if the same ratio of increase obtains the next 40 years we will find Congress appropriating annually something like $20,000,000,000.

Now, as I said a few moments ago, that increase, no doubt, was largely brought about by the multiplied activities, in almost every direction, of the Government that have been brought into being during these several years. But it certainly is out of proportion to the growth and the increase in the population and wealth of this country. And you will note this, in the study of the appropriations for the support of the Government beginning back in the administration of President Washington, I think, that there has never been a four-year period, a period of a single administration, where the expense of the Government decreased over that of the previous four-year period except in case of war, with perhaps only a single exception. Up until the Civil War in 1860 this Federal Government had never appropriated in a single year as much as $75,000,000 to operate the Government, and we have now reached the period where the appropriations required are so stupendous, where they are so appalling, as to challenge the attention and consideration of thoughtful men charged with the administration of the Government.

During these years this phenomenal increase in the cost of the Government has been widely discussed in the public press, in the magazines, in Congress, and in the State legislatures. A great many books have been written by college professors on how to cure this manifestly growing evil in the expenditures of government. I notice in reading the hearings of the committee that the committee had a few college professors before it, and got their views about the proper legislation and what kind of a budget should be created to meet the requirements of the situation. A careful analysis of the testimony of some of these eminent gentlemen has convinced me that they were absolutely ignorant in many respects of the practical operations of the Government, and as to how appropriations were made, and as to the workings of the Congress, and the manner in which the revenues were raised and the appropriations were made. I read some time ago where Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, who at one time was a very prominent Member of this House, said, in discussing college professors and their activity in politics, that a treatise by a college professor on how to run the Government was about as valuable as a dissertation by a soured old maid on how to rear children. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know of any class of business men in the United States to-day who are required to make a closer study of finding out how to make a given amount of money go a required distance than college professors? In other words, is it not a fact that the college professors of our land to-day are forced, by reason of very limited financial circumstances, to make their little stipend of resources and income that they have to run their institutions with go to the furthermost limit?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be true in their private life.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not private life. That is the school life of the country. And ought we not to give them credit for it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. My opinion is that if the Government were turned over in all its departments to college professors such as some of those who appeared before the committee, there would not be any money left in a very short time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman is not alluding to our mutual friend, the distinguished educator from Ohio, Dr. FESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. I certainly do not have him in mind. I am not speaking of Dr. FESS. Dr. FESS is one of the ablest and most practical men in Congress, and always instructs the House when he speaks. I am speaking of Dr. Willoughby, whoever he is, and Mr. Lindsay; and the whole trouble with their publications has been that they have assumed that the Congress of the United States is culpable in this matter.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. It is not my pleasure to know Dr. Willoughby, but I have read his book. Some of it may be theoretical, and, again, some of it may be intensely practical. But it seems to me the preparation of a budget along the line he suggests, whereby you can identify and thereby prevent duplication in the activities of the various departments, would be very helpful, although I realize that is not a matter of legislation but of practical operation and administration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say to the gentleman that Dr. Willoughby's second statement before the committee was much more illuminating than his first statement at a prior hearing, because he had in the meantime sat with the committee at its meetings and had heard some practical gentlemen discuss the matter. [Laughter.] But those who have written books on this subject in the main and those who are responsible for the articles in the magazines and the public press, who have been berating Congress because of its alleged extravagance and because of the growing expenses of the Government, were assailing the wrong body and the wrong branch of Government. It is my belief, based upon observation made during my service in this body and upon what I have observed as to the operation of the Government, that the only place in the entire structure of the Federal Government where there has been an honest effort made to cut down expenses and to economize has been right here on the floor of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] Take the estimates that have been submitted to Congress during the last 10 or 15 years by the departments of the Government, indicating the amounts that they requested and demanded of Congress, and compare those amounts with the appropriations actually made, and you will find that Congress, through the efficient Committee on Appropriations which we have been fortunate enough to have here session after session, has saved to the Government vast sums of money, running into the billions of dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will, if it is in relation to the subject that I am talking about.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman was present the other day when the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GOOD], in reply to my questions, stated that of the thousands of employees who were brought to Washington during the war, for the purposes of the war, only about 2,000 have been taken off the pay rolls and sent home. Now, are not we responsible for that?

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I believe the number was 2,100 or 2,200.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman wants to be accurate, I am sure. I suppose as many as 15,000 or 20,000 have been removed, but others have taken their places.

Mr. BLANTON. It amounts to the same thing, if others have taken their places, because the number has not been reduced. We are responsible for that. If the unnecessary ones are not sent home, are we not responsible for it when we let them stay here, or if, when some of them are sent home, we let others take their places?

Mr. WILLIAMS. My idea about that is that the heads of these departments under this administration are largely responsible for keeping thousands of unnecessary employees upon the pay rolls.

Mr. BLANTON. We are primarily responsible, because we appropriate the money to pay for them.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. If the heads of these departments continue these extravagant estimates after this budget becomes the law, it will be more embarrassing with the budget than it would be without it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Nebraska is absolutely right. I have no doubt in the world but what 30,000 or 40,000 employees on the pay roll of the Government in Washington could be discharged for the good of the service, and it ought to be done; but this legislation that we are bringing in here now has for its purpose—and I think we will find that it will largely accomplish that purpose—to furnish to the Congress definite and accurate information from time to time as to the needs of the public service, so that we can legislate on these appropriation bills perhaps in a more intelligent way than has been possible in the past.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Is it not the duty of the bureau heads now to furnish this definite and specific information as to their official needs?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, indeed.

Mr. REAVIS. If they pursue in the future the same policy that they have pursued in the past, will not the budget be a menace rather than a benefit?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the theory of the budget, of course, is that we are creating a department that will stand separate and apart from these spending departments of the Government, and that in order to make good, and make a record for itself, it will have only in view the object to conserve the Public Treasury and to furnish Congress information of a definite nature as to the expenses of the Government that are really necessary.

Mr. REAVIS. That is, we will have the estimates furnished by some one who takes into consideration the rights and needs of the people rather than the rights and needs of a department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. Of course, we need not expect during the first two or three years of the operation of the budget, in my judgment, to reap the benefits from it that will ultimately come if this system is enacted and adopted, and if we have, as we will have, an honest effort made on the part of the bureau of budget, which is directly responsible, under the President of the United States, to furnish the Congress information as to the money that is actually needed.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to compliment the gentleman on the splendid service he has rendered to the House in collecting the data which he has just given us in his speech. I was wondering if he had gone behind the Hayes administration, back to the beginning of the Government, and whether or not he had that data, so that he could put it into his speech for the benefit of the Members of the House?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have the data, but the increase in appropriations from the beginning of the Government up until the Civil War, while it was gradual, was not so great or rapid.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the gentleman began far enough after the Civil War so as to give normal figures. Now, I notice, in reading the hearings before the Budget Committee, a statement made by the chairman of the committee as to how much the estimates were reduced by the Congress of the United States in one year for instance. I was wondering if the gentleman himself had those figures.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the last 10 or 15 years—I do not know the exact number of years—the estimates were reduced more than $1,000,000,000 prior to this Congress, and the gentleman knows that this Congress has reduced the estimates about $900,000,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was wondering if the gentleman had any exact figures for the last 10 or 12 years.

Mr. Chairman, any thoughtful man after studying these figures will see the wisdom of inaugurating a system in the making of these appropriations for the future that will eliminate all waste and extravagance and limiting appropriations in every possible way. By the practice of the strictest economy we will never again see an annual appropriation bill that carries less than three or four billion dollars. Our interest charge alone will greatly exceed $1,000,000,000, and after next year sound business and wise statesmanship demand that we begin a reduction of our national debt from at least five hundred million to a billion dollars annually. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has stated that at least four billions will be required annually for years to come.

Where is this stupendous sum of money to come from? There are only two possible sources—to levy taxes on the people or further increase our burden of debt. When this fact becomes plain to the people, as it will, they are going to demand strict economy on the part of Congress, and will demand that appropriations be reduced to the actual requirements of the Government.

Heretofore the people have not been directly interested in these appropriations, because they did not feel the burden of taxes. Prior to the war our revenue was derived mainly from tariff duties and the internal revenue, and the weight of these taxes were not felt by the people; therefore they did not have such a direct and personal interest in the appropriations as they will now have, when they have to dig down into their own pockets to pay the bills. Until now the internal revenue produced about one-half of the money required to run the Government. With national prohibition the main part of that revenue has gone forever. The tariff, which has been such a fertile theme for discussion, has produced the other half. All students of the tariff agree that it will not be possible to frame a tariff bill either on the Republican theory of protection or the Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue only that will produce to exceed $500,000,000. We are therefore squarely up against the proposition that from now on anywhere from three to four billion dollars must be raised annually from the people direct. This necessity will not tend to make Congress any too popular with the people. Neither will it be an asset to the party that happens to be in power. For years to come one of the live, burning questions in our politics is going to be the expenditures of the Government. Parties will be voted into office and voted out of office on this issue. The people will demand a business administration of their Government, and they will judge parties and public men on their record in holding down profligate expenditures.

In order that the people may pass accurate judgment on these matters, it is necessary that our fiscal system, including both the raising of the revenues and their expenditure, should be such that responsibility can be placed, and that it can be definitely determined who is entitled to the credit or to the blame, as the case may be, in all these matters.

This law creating a budget system definitely fixes that responsibility. Under the bill the responsibility will, in the first instance, rest on the President and the executive branch of the Government. The President, through the machinery provided in the bill, will be required to submit to Congress on the first day of each regular session a full and detailed statement of the amount of money required for the various activities of the Government for the coming year. He will have to say: "I need this much money the coming year. Every dollar is necessary for the proper operation of the Government. I ask you, on my responsibility as President, to furnish me this amount."

When the President submits his budget the people will know the sum total of the money required to run the Government for a year. If the amount is too large and does not meet the approval of the country, the President and his administration will be held responsible by the people.

When the budget is submitted to Congress by the President a responsibility then attaches to Congress. If Congress approves the budget and grants the President the amount demanded, it then becomes equally responsible with him before the country. If Congress takes the position that the demands of the President are exorbitant and extravagant and cuts the estimates, a clear-cut issue is then made between the President and Congress, which is presented to the people in a manner they can understand and intelligently pass upon. This, in my judgment, will result in tremendous saving to the Treasury.

The bill then provides for the appointment of an official termed the comptroller general, whose duty it is to follow every appropriation made by Congress and see that the money is properly spent. This will be of invaluable service to Congress, as this official, being entirely independent of every other branch of the Government, is directly responsible to Congress. I shall not go further into the details of this legislation, as it has been fully explained in the many able speeches that have been made.

I will say, however, that I heartily support this measure as a wise, constructive piece of legislation, and congratulate the committee on their work in reporting a bill that apparently has the approval of the entire membership of the House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, you are familiar with Shakespeare's immortal truth in the tragedy of King Lear, proving that you can not give away your authority and still have it. The Constitution conferred certain power upon their Representatives in Congress. We can not delegate a duty to some one else and still have the same power and information that we would have if we performed it ourselves.

The Member from Nevada is jealous that no power be voted away, jealous that none be misused. We must approach the future with an intense anticipation of the duties and knowledge of our governmental requirements. [Applause.]

It was an honor to hear the distinguished Member from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] in lucid speech define our Nation's financial condition. His clearness of thought upon that subject was the result of labor and devotion. We were grateful for that knowledge, with ambition for his opportunity.

Does the budget legislation propose to turn that ability, knowledge, and duty for which we were elected over to an appointee? Do we voluntarily vote away this power, this pleasure of service and duty, to avoid toil, or do we feel some one is better qualified with diligence to serve our Nation?

The framers of the Constitution were wise to provide that our Senate share the duty of deciding foreign treaties. It would have added wisdom to give Representatives in Congress equal power.

How many of you gentlemen fresh from the people had your opinion sought by your Senators upon the most important problem of history? My every word is spoken with reverence for our Nation and my place, jealous of its power and jealous of my duty. As we debate this measure by sections, no portion which delegates our power will have my approval. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to make a few general remarks concerning the merits of this proposed legislation which has for its purpose the creation of a national budget, and to say something concerning the necessity of economy in the administration of the affairs of the National Government generally. This bill, if it meets the expectations of all of us, will reach a wide-felt need and will have a far-reaching effect toward stimulating a more rigid economy in Government expenditures.

In the first place, the director of the budget, with the salary proposed and with the assistance given him, should be a very competent and capable man, and if he properly performs his duties the budget, which will hereafter be submitted to Congress instead of the Book of Estimates, will be more carefully studied and scrutinized than has been the case under the old system. This will have the effect, I trust, of holding down some of the extravagant requests that have been made in the various departments, and will leave off of the list many of the unnecessary employees now finding lodgment in the various departments. Until we administer public affairs with the same strict economy that we administer our private affairs, we are going to waste a great deal of the people's money, and I sincerely hope the director of the budget will exercise that business judgment and intelligent economy that characterizes the successful business firms of our country, and if he does this, it will not only meet the hope and expectation of Congress but also of the American people.

Then the accounting department, which will be under the direction of the comptroller general, will audit very carefully all the expenditures after the money has been appropriated by Congress, and while in its nature it will be a post-mortem examination, yet I feel that it will have a beneficial effect. In other words, under the present system Congress makes appropriations and the money is turned over to the heads of the various departments of Government, and unless expensive investigation is ordered Congress does not know whether the money was expended according to its wishes or not, but under the auditing system there will be made by the comptroller general a careful audit of all expenditures of the Government, and the effect will be to advise Congress and the people whether or not those intrusted with the expenditures of public money have carried out the wishes of Congress and the people, and it goes without saying that this check, no doubt, will encourage caution and economy in the public expenditures.

If I may say so, Mr. Chairman, the great issue now before the American people and before Congress is the matter of the economic expenditure of public money. I saw an article in one of the Washington papers yesterday which said in effect that the two great parties are searching for a political issue. If I may be permitted to suggest to the writer of that article, neither party now has to search for that issue, because it has already been determined, and hereafter the great issue before the American people will be that touching the expenditure of public money and the amount of taxes that will be exacted in order to meet such expenditures, and hereafter the man who aspires to public leadership will have to give an account before his constituency of how he has expended or will expend money from the Public Treasury.

In the history of the English Government you will find that the expenditures were made at random, more or less in a way similar to ours, for a great number of years, and then William E. Gladstone came forward as one of the great leaders of his day and gave the best of his life in defense of the treasury of England, and under his leadership there was created the system of the exchequer and the audit, which has stood the test of all the legal attacks made against it for more than 50 years; Gladstone's name has gone down in history as one of England's greatest statesmen and the exchequer and audit has remained the vital issue before the English people from that day until this, and will continue to be the issue through all time to come.

Now is the time in the history of the American people that some great man come forward, as Gladstone did in England, and become a dominant force that will reorganize the financial system of this Nation in such a way as to give to the United States a great business administration and see to it that the taxes which must be exacted of the people of the United States are expended with the strictest economy. [Applause.] Henceforth this is the issue, the vital question to the people back at home—What are you going to do with the public money? And they will take no evasive answer in reply; they are reasonable, but they will not be deceived; they want the money they pay into the Public Treasury to be judiciously expended; they want value received for their money.

I am not one of those who try to make the public believe that all the money that has been spent in the past has been wasted—far from it—for such demagoguery as that has a bad effect when it comes from a Member of Congress, or, for that matter, any other public official, as it serves to cast discredit upon those who have unselfishly sought to serve the people whom they have been elected to serve. However, no man will deny that public money has been wasted and extravagantly expended; but by a careful study of the various needs of the Government the expenditures can be cut down very largely, and the public will get the benefit, dollar for dollar, of the money that is spent. The people at home expect us to see that this is done, and they are expecting relief from the heavy burden of taxation that is now imposed upon them.

The farmers of this Nation have borne the burdens of taxation without complaint, and during the war these burdens were heavily increased, yet without a murmur or complaint they paid whatever they were asked to pay; but now that the war is over we are, or should be, returning to the paths of peace, and the people at home are expecting us to do something to relieve the heavy taxes that were required to be paid into the Federal Treasury. The income and excess-profits taxes that have been levied in the past, and that seem to be the only means of meeting Government expenditures, have fallen heavily upon the farmers of our country.

They have been making a little money during the past few years, but most of the profit has gone back into the Government, either in the form of taxes or in the purchase of Liberty bonds. The income and excess-profits tax as now levied has a tendency to discourage progress, development, and individual initiative. The farmer with a few dollars invested, by putting into it the very hard labor of himself and children, has succeeded in bringing in good returns, and has in fact made a little profit, and we want to so regulate our financial affairs in the future that the man who makes the profit by his energy and initiative will be permitted to retain as much as possible of that which he earns by his own efforts and the effort of his family in order to protect them against the hardship of a rainy day. [Applause.]

Indeed, if I may say so, Mr. Chairman, we should hasten back, and that as quickly as possible, to the paths of peace. We must discourage extravagant expenditures wherever found, either in public or private life. We want to go back to that good old-fashioned democracy which gives to every man the right to make his own fortune, and that with as little interference and regulation on the part of the Government as possible. The high cost of living, with those things that follow, about which much has been said recently, will never be reduced until the American people go back to the paths of peace and are conservative in their investments, conservative in their daily method of living, and until they exercise and practice the strictest economy, and in order to do this it is necessary that we get back as quickly as possible to normal conditions.

In furtherance of this plan I believe we should return the railroads to their owners under legislation that will properly safeguard the public as speedily as possible. [Applause.] We ought to build a permanent and enduring merchant marine system, and by proper legislation close the doors against undesirable immigration, shutting out those who would come in to disturb our economic and social conditions, and that the agitator should be hit—and hit hard; that the doctrine of conservatism, rational, and economic living should be preached from every pulpit and platform, and every man should be given, as far as possible, the chance to reap the fruits of his own toil; it is in this way only that we will destroy the agitator and put business back on a conservative basis.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we are not going to do this by bickering across the aisle; we are not going to do this by hurling accusations from one side of the aisle to the other; we are not going to do this by making charges and countercharges; but we can, as Representatives of the great American people, do this by putting our shoulders to the wheel, the men on the left of the aisle pulling together with the men on the right of the aisle as one great man for the common and unselfish good of our great American Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House: If it were not for the fact that this bill is supported by so many of the ablest and most experienced and most patriotic men of the House, I should find myself absolutely without any faith in its efficacy to accomplish the purpose for which it is intended. Of course, generally speaking, we are all in perfect accord in the purpose underlying the bill. Every thoughtful man in this House has come to recognize the great danger that confronts us on account of the extravagance of the Federal Government and of the various States and other Government subdivisions of the country. Before the recent war the total expenses of the National Government amounted to about $1,500,000,000 a year. Our total indebtedness was less than $1,000,000,000. The annual interest on this sum was only a little more than $20,000,000. We are told on good authority that when the final balance is struck and the present war technically closed the obligations of the Government will amount to more than $30,000,000,000. It will require nearly $1,500,000,000 to take care of the sinking fund and interests on these obligations. This sum about equals the total cost of running the Federal Government before the war. And it is now estimated that it will require something like $5,000,000,000 annually to meet the vast expense of the Government. This presents a situation that challenges the careful consideration of every Member of this body. The records of history show that money as represented in taxes or commerce or conquest has always been a prolific source of war. The discharge of a debt amounting to $30,000,000,000 would endanger the very existence of any other government that ever existed on earth; and we shall be fortunate, indeed, if we are able to solve the problems facing us without engendering disputes and class hatreds that will seriously disturb the happiness of our people, if they do not endanger the preservation of the Republic.

Extravagance is rampant on every hand—in the home, in the family, and in the conduct of the Government. It is interfering with the education and hindering the moral development of the youth of the land. I believe I appreciate the seriousness of the situation as fully as any Member of this House. During the excitement of the war and the dangers involved in that conflict, of course, we had little time to count the cost or think of economy. Our first thought was to win the war in the quickest way and with the least possible loss of life. We did not care to consider the mere matter of money as against the lives of the brave boys who were fighting for our flag.

But in this connection I may say that since the war I have been casting my vote against additional appropriations and new schemes for the creation of boards and departments, necessitating new expenditures by the Government. I have done so consistently, as the RECORD will show, and I intend to continue to do it. And, my friends, we may as well face the fact that this is the only way to cure the evil of extravagance. The remedy rests with the individual Members of this House and of the Senate.

Now, what is the first thing that confronts us when we fix our eyes on this bill? The two first lines of the first paragraph of the bill provide for the creation of a Bureau, with a Director to receive a salary of $10,000 a year and an Assistant Director at $7,500 a year. This Bureau is to serve as a buffer between Members of Congress and their constituents. The Director of this Bureau is authorized to appoint and fix the pay of employees and to spend money for rent, printing, telegrams, telephones, law books, books of reference, stationery, furniture, office equipment, and other supplies—to organize in due and ancient form as a department of the Government.

The initial appropriation for the expense of this department is $100,000. We all know what that means. It is only a beginning. I will say frankly that I have very little faith in any economic reform to be accomplished by any measure that starts out with the creation of a new board or bureau or a new department in our Government. If any committee will report an act to abolish some board or bureau or to cut its appropriation or the number of its employees in half, I think I should be willing to promise offhand to cast one vote in favor of such a bill, no matter in what direction it strikes. But I shall have to be convinced before I favor any bill that starts out with the creation of another board or bureau in Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. WELLING. There ought to be one feature of this bill particularly inviting to the gentleman. I refer to the one wherein it abolishes the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, no; not at all. There is no——

Mr. SEARS. It does not abolish it at all. It simply raises his salary to $10,000 a year.

Mr. STEAGALL. It does not abolish the office of Comptroller of the Treasury. It simply substitutes for him an officer to be known as a Comptroller General, who is to perform the same duties, the salary being raised to $10,000 a year, as suggested by my friend from Florida [Mr. SEARS]. Then there is to be an Assistant Comptroller General, at $7,500 a year, to take the place of the Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury. The Comptroller General also has authority, specifically conferred by the act, to appoint as many as three employees, each at a salary of $5,000 a year, independent of civil-service regulations. The Director of the Bureau of the Budget is also empowered to appoint three men at $5,000 a year each in addition to the others he may deem necessary in his department. If you will examine the bill, on page 9, at the bottom, you will find that the Comptroller General, in addition to his Assistant and the other three men provided for at salaries of $5,000 each and the entire force in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, which is to be transferred to the new department, is authorized to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees in his department as may be provided. In making these appointments he is responsible to nobody, and he may fix the salaries as he pleases, according to his own sweet will, with the one single limitation that not more than three shall be allowed salaries of more than $5,000 each. We know well enough how the head of every department in Washington thinks that the whole scheme of government depends upon him and those employed under him, and how hard it is ever to hold down the salaries or the number of people employed in any department. Always Congress cuts the estimates. Every year the Congress saves millions and millions of dollars by the reductions in the estimates of the various departments. Yet knowing all these things to be true, the members of the Budget Committee have reported a bill which makes the Comptroller General and the Assistant Comptroller General officers for life, and even provides that they may be retired at half pay when they reach 70 years of age; and which makes them responsible, we might say, to nobody but the good Father who rules us all. Why do I say that? I know that they are supposed to be responsible to Congress, but a close analysis of the language of the act shows that as a practical proposition this is not true. But I am opposed to life tenure in office for the head of any department in this Government, even if absolute power over him were retained in the Congress of the United States. It is un-American and undemocratic. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will be glad to yield in a moment. The act provides that the Comptroller General and the Assistant Comptroller General may be removed if "inefficient" or "guilty of neglect of duty" or "malfeasance in office." What is "inefficiency"? "Inefficiency" would be defined in various ways, according to the mind of the individual passing upon the question. But in no event would the question hinge upon whether or not an officer was cautious or liberal regarding expenditure of money for the public welfare. What is meant by the phrase "guilty of neglect of duty"? Certainly no lawyer would contend that an officer would be "guilty of neglect of duty" simply because he favored a liberal expenditure of the public money for the public welfare. So of an officer accused of "malfeasance in office." The words would be held to involve bad faith or corruption. In no case would this clause be construed to apply to an officer who might be liberal in his views regarding expenditures. So we see there is nothing in these provisions of the act that would enable the Congress to get rid of a Comptroller General or the Assistant Comptroller General because of a failure to economize. And, following the enumeration of these grounds of removal we find this specific clause, "and for no other cause and in no other manner." So it is beyond controversy that for the mere failure to enforce economy there is no power in the President nor the Congress through which the Comptroller General nor the Assistant Comptroller General may be removed. We have made them officers for life with no power retained in the Congress by which to get rid of them, even though their retention in office might result in the unnecessary expenditure of billions of dollars every year.

Another thing proposed in connection with this bill that does not appeal to me is the revision of the rules of the House. The plan contemplates the creation of a supercommittee on the subject of appropriations, a committee to have charge of all bills involving expenditures. At the same time we are told that we shall let the various appropriation committees continue to function, in so far as the right to make authorizations regarding the various departments is concerned.

This looks to me like a duplication of work, and that is one of the things that we have been crying out against, and that ought not to be countenanced here nor in any other branch of the Government. This new committee could never hope to become more familiar with conditions and necessities in the various departments of government than the committees of this House, the Members of which are in peculiar touch with each of those departments and who have been studying their operation for years and years. Besides, so far as I am concerned, I do not like the idea of centralizing power in this body. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. STEAGALL. This body is in charge of itself. The majority has absolute control. It is democratic in its organization, everyone has his say, everyone has recognition, and I hate to see this changed. I can not see my way clear to vote to put all this vast power in one committee. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I have about reached the point where I am slow to throw up my hat for something simply because it is offered as a reform, and I have been counted as a kind of reformer all my life. Before I came to Congress I favored nearly all of the progressive policies of my party—"new-fangled issues" they were sometimes called. In many instances there is no doubt we were right; but I think I have learned some things during my service as a Member of this body, and to tell you the whole truth, I am not quite sure that I have not unlearned a few. Merely to call a thing a reform does not enthuse me any more so much as it used to, though I wish it understood that I am still a young man. [Laughter.] I confess I am alarmed at the senseless and incessant clamor for change to be heard on every hand. I deplore the discontent and dissatisfaction with customs and ideals and institutions we have been taught so long to regard as sacred. We have upset so many things that I sometimes fear I shall wake up some morning to find myself left-handed. [Laughter.] I once heard my father tell a story that illustrates my view of what is needed in this Government. There was a great preacher down in my country who once held a big revival meeting. Soon after the meeting closed he met a friend and told him about it. The preacher said it was the greatest revival he had ever known in his life. The friend was a religious man and, being delighted with the report, hastened to inquire, "And how many new members did you take in?" The preacher replied, "We did not take in any; we turned out 130." [Laughter.] My friends, this is the method to be employed in this body if we are to give the people the reforms they desire at our hands. [Applause.]

We need an end to the senseless cry for change. We need a revival of conservatism and common sense. If we are going to cut down expenses, instead of passing new laws and creating new boards and bureaus, we should repeal some of the laws now on the statute books and abolish some of the boards and bureaus now in operation. [Applause.] If there is anything that the people of this country are sick and tired of, it is boards and bureaus in Washington to govern their activities. I am not lecturing anybody nor criticizing anybody nor putting any blame on anybody that I do not take my own share of. I know that we did a great many things during the war that we would not have thought of doing under other conditions and, of course, we made some mistakes, though I think it safe to say that in every such case the fault lay primarily with the heads of departments, Army officers, and other so-called experts who thought they were wiser than Congress and who were allowed to influence our action. But the fact is there is hardly anything in this country or any business establishment from the Pennsylvania Railroad to a peanut stand that a man can now operate without having a Federal official superintend him. The truth is, we have too much government. We are drifting away from the old maxim that the people least governed are the best governed.

This Congress, even though the war ended about a year ago, notwithstanding the enormous burdens entailed, is going right on increasing salaries, creating officers, establishing boards and bureaus, granting pensions to civil employees, and spending money as if the country did not owe a dollar and had billions in the Treasury lying idle. As a remedy for this we are told that we shall shift responsibility on the President. Well, in the first place, I do not believe this body is bankrupt, either in intelligence, in courage, or in patriotism. In any event, we have assumed the responsibility under oath and we can not get rid of it, even if we would.

But let us see what will become of the effort to place responsibility on the President. The Members of this House have to face their constituents every two years and give account of their conduct here. The President holds office for four years and will not be a candidate every time Members of this House offer for reelection. The people, if they have the good sense they ought to have and that I believe they have, will not submit very long to the enormous burdens they are now carrying without calling their Representatives to account, unless they are shown that these burdens are necessary for the support of the Government, economically and sensibly administered.

Our revenue can no longer be raised by tariff laws, as formerly. Taxes are now in the main levied directly. The people know what they are required to contribute to the support of the Government and they are going to demand full understanding of the manner and purposes for which it is expended. But suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the President should be a candidate for reelection, do you suppose that the election of a President is likely to be determined by what his Budget Bureau recommends to Congress? Why, of course——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Of course, the determination of a presidential campaign will not be decided upon an issue like that. I believe it is true that we did once have a candidate for the Presidency who talked quite a lot about a horse doctor in the Geodetic Survey, but no candidate for the Presidency is likely to adopt that method of campaigning any time soon! Campaigns for the Presidency will be fought out over questions of world-wide importance. Gentlemen, the truth of the matter is there is but one hope for reforming conditions in this body, and that hope rests upon the courage and patriotism of the individual Member of Congress and his recognition of his responsibility to his people at home. [Applause.] If the regard of Members of this House for their constituents who must pay the taxes to meet the expenditures made by Congress, Members who must confront their constituents every two years to give an account of their record here—if they can not be trusted to take care of the situation, it is useless to hope for better things at the hands of some head of a bureau who holds office by appointment. I confess I have no faith in it.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman permit me to say further, especially where you have a life tenure?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; whether he is in for four years at the will of the President or for life. Of course, if he is in for life, it only makes the case much worse. Gentlemen, I know it is a common thing for men to asperse Congress, and I never hear a thoughtless fellow engaged in wholesale denunciation of the representatives of the people of this great Nation that I am not sorry for him. Every man ought to know that the protection of the masses rests in the keeping of their own chosen representatives, and it is in them that we must find the intelligence and patriotism upon which depends the perpetuity of this Republic. [Applause.] My friends, as I see the matter—though I express my opinion in the face of the fact that many older, abler, and more experienced Members of the House view it otherwise—the hope for relief from reckless extravagance under which the people suffer rests upon their chosen representatives, and I have no faith in any scheme by which this body is to go out and hire some fellow to tell us how to run the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] The less outsiders are permitted to influence our action, the better it will be. The people to whom we owe our highest duty do not come here. They rely upon us to protect their interests. I know it is mighty easy to find a man on any corner who cusses Congress and who can tell exactly what ought to be done and how this body should be run, but about nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand when you find one of these fellows you will discover that he could not be elected to any office in his precinct, and that if he could live another hundred years would have no chance ever to become a Member of this great body. [Applause.] I believe there is more patriotism and brains, more legislative capacity, in this Congress, chosen as the representative of the great free people of this country, than could be found in any other body of men of like size that ever assembled on this earth. If the President were ordered to select a like number of men or twice the number who compose this body to attempt to tell us how to legislate, the scheme would be a failure. I think I know it can not be less, if we send him out to organize a board or bureau for that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, almost daily our Republican friends from across the aisle with tears in their eyes deeply deprecate the increased expenditures of our Government, and then in the next breath lay the blame upon what they term "Democratic departments" of Government. I wonder if our friends do not know how ridiculous their position is to the people of this country who know the facts, who know that the estimates of the expenditures of these various departments and the designated clerical force required are largely made up by the chiefs of those departments, many of whom, and a majority of whom, are Republicans in politics and who hold their positions under the civil-service rules of this Government, and many of whom have filled their positions for 25, 30, and even 40 years. Department heads recommend estimates made by these department chiefs independently holding their positions for life under civil-service regulations.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I can not, as I have only three minutes. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, in reply to my question the other day admitted that out of the many thousands of war clerks only about 2,100 had been sent home, and he laid the blame on the departments; and I am advised that every time one of these departments turns loose some of these war workers who are unnecessary and tells them to go home that the very next day a Congressman, in many instances a Republican, comes down with his constituents, both to the department and to the Civil Service Commission, demanding that they be reinstated in that or some other department—and there is the trouble. That is the reason we have all of these thousands of war workers who we know are unnecessary at this time and who long since should have been sent home, and that is the reason there are so many still hanging on to public jobs with no work to do of any value, and that is the reason, as I told the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] awhile ago, that the blame is not on these departments, Republican and Democratic chiefs alike, but the blame primarily rests upon the Congress, upon each and every one of us Members, if you please, and these war workers are going to continue to hold their positions just as long as Members of Congress sit here and permit them to do so.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman promised to yield me some time. I will yield.

Mr. GOOD. I yield the gentleman a minute. The gentleman says the blame is on the Congress. Congress passed on February 28 last the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, carrying something like $97,000,000 for salaries of clerks in Washington, and for other purposes. That was for the whole year. When Congress did that, why the whole control passed out of Congress, so far as employing those clerks in the departments was concerned, until the 1st of July, 1921.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, the gentleman, I am sure, is going to give me another minute, because he took up nearly all of the one he yielded. No; I can not agree that the control has passed beyond Congress, for we hold the purse strings, and if we directed these departments to immediately return all unnecessary clerks to their homes, and then let them understand that we meant business and expected our orders to be obeyed, they would be obeyed. We must be willing to do our own thinking and make some investigations ourselves and check up these estimates which are so liberally enlarged when the chiefs present them to the heads of departments and, in turn, they are passed on to us for granting.

And we Members of Congress must let our zeal for the Nation as a whole be greater than our zeal for some of our constituents who may be holding these unnecessary jobs, and when they are cut loose we must not get them reinstated.

And I want to state to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] that there is one way that this Congress can send those war workers home, and he knows it, and you know it, and I know it, and the people know it; he could bring in a resolution to-morrow, because he has control of the Rules Committee—a resolution demanding of these departments that these unnecessary war workers be sent home. He knows it, I know it, and you know it, and the people of this country know it. Then, if that is the case, why blame it on the departments? I will tell you what we ought to do. When these departments come in here with these unnecessary estimates, if they should want to hold these clerks on, we must learn to sit down on them and show them when the time comes where, to use an American expression, to "head in." When we do that we are going to stop this unnecessary expense. Until we do that, they are still going to hang on to the public offices they hold.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, not many questions as important as this one will come before this Congress. And there are few that are attracting so lively an interest on the part of substantial people throughout the country. There was a time when Congress, without serious consequences to the country, without serious danger of disaster, could appropriate for any service that might be thought to be desirable. There was not much fear of pressing too hard upon the sources of revenue. Congress had never laid unbearable burdens upon the people. That time, however, has passed. The expenses of the war have been enormous, and the interest that is to be paid upon our bonds will amount to more than the total expenditures of the Government five years ago. In addition to that the high cost of living has affected the Government, as it has affected the individual. Everything that the Government buys costs more, and every man or woman in the employ of the Government demands—yes, and needs—increase of salary in order to meet the higher cost of living for the individual. So that our expenses of government will be much higher, probably, for many years to come than they have been in the past.

We must keep up a high rate of taxation, and the people will feel it as burdensome. For that reason there is much more interest in economy on the part of the Government than there has ever been before, and I believe that the problem that is before the present Congress is greater than the problem that was before the Sixty-fifth Congress. Then everybody knew that there was only one thing to be considered, and that all other things must yield to the necessity of overcoming our enemy.

At the present time there is more difference of opinion about policies. A great many things are to be settled—the question of the railroads, of the merchant marine, of our foreign policy—but among them there is none of more importance than this one. I have thought that for a little while I should like to take up three things—the present method of dealing with the finances of the Government, the necessity of reforming that method, and then show the proposals of your Special Committee on the Budget, which are found, first, in the bill that is now pending, and, second, in the resolution which is to come up later for the modification of the rules of the House.

And taking up in that order the points that I wish to discuss, I shall give my attention, first—and not for very long—to the present financial methods of the Government.

With the increased public interest in this matter there has been great multiplication of magazine articles and newspaper editorials and weightier articles in the reviews dealing with the reform of the budget, or, as many of them say, the adoption of a budget system. Many of these review articles and magazine articles and newspaper editorials have been helpful. Much of the criticism of our present method, the criticism of Congress along with other branches of the Government, has been justified. And we ought to listen to well-informed criticism. But along with the helpful criticism, valuable to every student of governmental affairs, there has been a flood of exceedingly uninformed criticism. Men who are professional writers and who know how to prepare very readable articles with meager allowance of information have rushed into print on this question, some of them amusing, some of them, it must be confessed, irritating, but all of them easily to be distinguished from the genuine students of governmental methods, who have furnished valuable criticisms which we would do well to follow.

I remember one article—and I do not intend to mention the name of the writer—in which it is said, in an attack on Congress that would be irritating if it were not amusing, that Congress does not know, has no means of finding out, and does not wish to know anything about the relation between the Government's revenues and its expenditures until it is too late for the knowledge to do any good.

Well, I do not intend to read in the hearing of the members of this committee the information that is furnished to Congress, but I should like to call your attention to one volume that is prepared by the administrative department to furnish information to the appropriating committees.

The pages are 9 inches by 11 inches, and there are 1,093 pages the Book of Estimates, in which the heads of the administrative bureaus send up, through the Cabinet Secretaries, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who transmits them to the Speaker of the House, estimates of the needs of the various bureaus and departments for the coming fiscal year. This copy which I hold in my hand is the estimates for the fiscal year of 1920. Along with that, the estimates of the needs for the coming year, the Secretary of the Treasury sends to the Speaker of the House of Representatives a combined statement of the receipts and disbursements and balances of the United States Government for the last completed fiscal year. These come to us in a volume whose pages are of the same size, 9 inches by 11 inches, to the extent of 200 pages. This came to us at the same time that the Book of Estimates came. We have there a combined statement of the receipts and disbursements for the last completed year, the last year for which complete statements could be made. We have also an estimate for the next year that is to come.

Now, what have we for the current fiscal year that lies between those two? In the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury we have statements boiling down the combined statement of receipts and disbursements, with statements of receipts and disbursements for the year ending June 30, 1918, with comparative statements of the receipts and disbursements of that year with the year next preceding it. We have these full statements of the receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, compared with the receipts and disbursements of the year ending June 30, 1918, together with estimates of the receipts for the current, but yet uncompleted, year, ending June 30, 1919. It came to us last December, and the fiscal year would not be completed until the 30th of the following June, so, of course, the best that could be done was to make estimates of the receipts expected in the Treasury and the disbursements expected, based upon the appropriations that had already been made, and possible deficiencies. And along with that is an estimate for still one year more in the future, based on existing revenue laws and estimates of receipts and disbursements for the year ending June 30, 1920. That is, the estimates came to us in December, 1918, including the reports, the ascertained facts, for the year ending June 30, 1917, and also for the year ending June 30, 1918. Those reports and comparisons were in our hands.

The estimates also of the partly completed year then current were placed before us, and the estimates of the expected revenues for the next year to come, together with the very large Book of Estimates of the appropriations needed for the year to come, the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. These were all in our hands before we began to make the appropriation bills in December, 1918.

There is no need for me to remind Members of the House of the manner in which these estimates are handled after the Secretary of the Treasury has sent them to the Speaker of the House. The estimates are sent to the Committee on Appropriations and to the other committees which prepare appropriation bills. The naval bill is prepared by the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Army bill by the Committee on Military Affairs, and so on. There are eight committees in all which have charge of the preparation of these supply bills.

Each of these committees spends weeks, some of those having charge of bills carrying the larger amounts spend months, in studying the estimates, hearing witnesses, examining the heads of bureaus, divisions, and departments, sometimes calling before the committee the Secretary of War, the Secretary of State, or other Cabinet member having jurisdiction over the department for which the appropriation is being made.

Volumes of testimony are taken. It is printed and made available for other Members of Congress who have been busy on other committees which are making like investigations for appropriation bills dealing with other departments. Every winter there is not only one bill but several on each of which the testimony fills hundreds, and, in many instances, thousands, of pages. No Member of Congress can neglect these volumes of "committee hearings" and feel that he has done his duty in preparing himself to vote intelligently on the appropriation bills which are to come before the House. It is nevertheless true that the volume of business is so large that every man must deliberately choose the field within which he will do the greater part of his work and make up his mind to limit his studies in other bills very largely to controverted matters.

Congress does have, not in one volume but still accessible, though the information is to be collected from three volumes, statements of the revenues and expenditures of the last completed fiscal year, estimates of the revenues and expenditures of the current fiscal year, and estimates of prospective revenues and expenditure needs for the next ensuing fiscal year.

Why is not that enough? Well, it is not enough; our present method is not satisfactory. It can be improved; it ought to be improved; and it is going to be improved very shortly. [Applause.] But it is not the fool system that some of our fool critics think it is. [Applause.] Some of these gentlemen are much more desirous of making strong statements than of making true statements. They tell us that Congress does not know, has no means of knowing, and does not wish to know the relation between receipts and expenditures. I say that these gentlemen do not know. They did have the means of knowing, but did not care to use them.

Why does the present system need improvement? The principal reason, in my judgment, is that in spite of the bulk of the book that contains the estimates there is nowhere a central authority in the preparation of those estimates that will coordinate them, that will detect and make stand out in the bright light the overlapping functions of the various departments, the duplication of services. If we correct their overlappings and duplications we will improve the service and at the same time save a considerable amount of money.

These estimates are made, as has been said, in the various spending bureaus, the bureaus that perform services for the people of the United States. Of course, the performance of these services costs money.

The bureaus make an estimate of the work they expect to do and the amount of money it is going to cost them to do it. In each department of the Government—the State Department, the Agricultural Department, the Navy Department, and all the rest—the various bureaus send their estimates to the head of the department. The head of the department has authority to revise, to suggest a recasting of those estimates. It is commonly believed that some of the Cabinet Secretaries do exercise some control over the bureaus in their department and that some of them do not.

I do not feel at liberty to enlarge very much on one incident that turned up in 1917. It would have been unwise to mention it at all at that time. The war was on, and it was as important to preserve the morale of the people of the United States as it was to maintain the morale of the Army. But in one of the departments, the War Department, there were duplicate estimates. Different bureaus in the War Department had estimated for the same thing, one item of about 40,000 machine guns. It was not discovered in the office of the Secretary of War. When all the estimates from all the departments went to the office of the Secretary of the Treasury the thing was either not detected there or it was not thought that there was power there to correct it. But it was detected; it was discovered in the House Committee on Military Affairs, and the duplication was not appropriated for by duplicate appropriations. That was one of the reasons why Congress was able to cut down the estimates of that year.

Gentlemen of the committee, do you realize that the estimates that came to the Sixty-fifth Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, amounted to more than $30,000,000,000? That is what the departments asked for, the War Department, the Navy Department, and all the rest, more than $30,000,000,000; and the appropriating committees of Congress pared down those estimates and saved more than $5,000,000,000, cutting down the estimates to a little bit more than $25,000,000,000, whereas they originally had been a little more than $30,000,000,000. It is to be remembered also that this pruning did not prevent nor postpone the winning of the war. The pruning is not unusual. The year ending June 30, 1919, was an abnormal year, and, of course, the estimates were abnormal. But I want to call your attention to a table, and I should like at this point, Mr. Chairman, to obtain permission to revise and extend by remarks so as to include this table, which I do not intend to read in full.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the manner suggested. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[1] The appropriations for 1903 include the sum of $50,130,000 for the Panama Canal, an amount not submitted in the estimates for that fiscal year. If that amount be eliminated, the excess of estimates would be $25,853,821.92.

Mr. TEMPLE. I will read just an item or two. This is a table giving a comparative statement for the 20-year period ending June 30, 1916, showing the estimates submitted to Congress by the administrative departments through the Secretary of the Treasury and comparing them with the appropriations made by Congress during those years, including in the appropriations made by Congress all the appropriations which originated either in this House or in the Senate and which had not been covered at all by the estimates. Including those additions, what are the facts? For the period of 20 years, every year save two shows that Congress appropriated less money by millions than was demanded in the estimates. Whether it was a Republican Congress or a Democratic Congress, the same thing was true. It is Congress that has been putting on the brake, although throughout the country Congress is spoken of as the agency of extravagance.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman two questions.

Mr. TEMPLE. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do not these essays that the gentleman talks about represent that Congress is exceedingly extravagant and that the departments hold them down?

Mr. TEMPLE. A good many of them do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, is not exactly the reverse of that true?

Mr. TEMPLE. I think the gentleman is exactly right. For example, in the year 1916 the estimates called for $1,135,000,000. We appropriated $1,114,000,000, saving $20,000,000 under the estimates—under the amounts asked for. In the preceding year, 1915, the saving was $36,000,000; and so on, year after year, every year in the whole 20 except 2.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman to give us a few more of those figures. They are mighty interesting.

Mr. TEMPLE. I shall print the table in connection with my remarks.

Mr. JUUL. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER. Tell us about the two years.

Mr. TEMPLE. In the two years in which the appropriations by Congress exceeded the estimates submitted there was included the year 1903, in which there was an appropriation of $50,000,000 for the Panama Canal, which was not called for by the estimates. That was an extraordinary appropriation, and it is hardly fair to put it in the tables at all. If it is left out, there is only one year, then, in which the appropriations of Congress exceeded the estimates submitted, and that was the year ending June 30, 1912; and in the total for the 20 years, leaving in the table the $50,000,000 for the Panama Canal, which ought not to be left in, the whole reduction by Congress, the amount by which the appropriations were less than the estimates, reaches the total of $555,000,000.

Nevertheless I want to emphasize the thing that I pointed out a little while ago, the failure of anybody in the administrative departments to catch up the duplication made in the estimates for 1917 for those 40,000 machine guns and several other items amounting to more millions of dollars than I care to mention even now.

That was picked up by the House Committee on Military Affairs, and similar things are picked up by the appropriating committees in the very careful investigations that they ordinarily make of all these estimates year after year. It is Congress that attempts to put on the brake, and does put on the brake. Why is this? I will tell you one reason: It is only normal to expect that the bureau chiefs will ask for more money than Congress will be willing to give. Any man at the head of a bureau who does not think his work is exceedingly important, who does not really overestimate its importance and see the service it can render much more plainly than he sees the service that other bureaus can perform, is hardly fit to be the head of a bureau. We expect those men to grow enthusiastic about their work. We really expect them to make estimates for larger appropriations than the country at large would be willing for them to have.

Such a man is like a horse that pulls on the bit when you are driving. He is eager for his work. It is not a blameworthy trait; it is praiseworthy. It is his business to pull and it is our business to hold him in, and we do it. Our work would be easier if somebody in the executive and administrative branch of the Government would prepare a book of estimates in which we could put more faith. That is what we want. [Applause.]

Now, we are not attempting to unload any of our work on the executive branch of the Government. We are not going to give up any of our responsibility. We will still be responsible for the appropriation bills. We are now dependent on the information that we can dig out from sometimes unwilling witnesses who come before the committees. Sometimes also these men, when the appropriating committee in the House refuses them certain things which they have asked for, will squirm around and find some other way to get the appropriation in, will go to the Committee on Appropriations and get them to put it in a deficiency bill, or will go over to the Senate and get the Senate appropriating committee to put it in. We have to head them off at every gap in the fence, or they will break through somehow.

And nobody is responsible for this general Book of Estimates. The act of March 4, 1909, does provide that if the Secretary of the Treasury finds that the estimated expenditures exceed the estimated revenues for the coming fiscal year he shall then submit the estimates, together with a statement of the expected revenues, to the President, and the President shall then call the attention of Congress to the excess of estimated expenditures over prospective revenues and suggest where the estimates may be cut or how the revenues may be increased. We have already recognized the President's responsibility for that work in the act just mentioned, the act of March 4, 1909. If the present bill passes it will furnish the President with machinery by which he can examine these estimates, by which he can perform that work that we have laid upon him, and perform it intelligently. It is the duty of the President under the Constitution to do that. We are not increasing his duties nor enlarging his powers. We are only giving him the means of exercising his powers and at the same time requiring that he assume the responsibility that goes with power. If he says now that he has not the machinery with which to make these estimates, we will furnish him the machinery.

That brings me, then, to a discussion of the pending legislation. I have spent more time on the preliminary discussion than I had intended to.

There are three things that we want to accomplish. First, we want to get trustworthy estimates; second, we want to improve our own methods of dealing with those estimates in making appropriations; in the third place, when the appropriation has been made, we want to follow the thing up and find out whether the money was expended in accordance with the terms of the act by which it was appropriated. Two of those things are included in the present bill—the first and the third.

We have not included in the present bill any attempt to reorganize the committees of the House, and for a very good reason. An act of Congress after it passes this House goes to the Senate and must pass that body, and then must go to the President and be signed by him before it can become a law. The committees of the House are creatures of the rules of the House, and the Constitution provides that each House may make rules for its own procedure. We do not put into the bill, then, any reform of our own rules, because the Senate has nothing to do with the rules of the House, and the House does not care to dictate at all to the Senate anything about the rules of the Senate. We intend to keep in our own hands the power that the Constitution places in our hands, so that we may be responsible, as the Constitution places the responsibility on us, for the organization and the work of the House of Representatives, and we do not put into an act which must pass the Senate any provision for the reorganization of the working machinery of the House, because the Senate has no jurisdiction over the House.

I may say in passing that the Senate does not exactly attempt to assume jurisdiction over the House, but occasionally a bill comes back from the Senate in such a shape that we hardly recognize it. Just in passing I call your attention to one proposal in the resolution modifying our rules, which will come up later, probably after this bill has been entirely disposed of by the Senate and the President, and which we shall probably consider at the next session of Congress.

One of the provisions in the resolution is to this effect: You are all familiar with the fact that if any Member of the House proposes an amendment calling for an appropriation which is not provided for in existing law any Member of the House can stop it. It is contrary to the rules of the House, and all that is necessary is for a man to make the point of order against it that it is an appropriation unprovided for in existing law. Many a time such an amendment is thrown out on the floor of the House. Then the bill goes over to the Senate and comes back with that amendment in it. Now, we put into this proposed revision of the rules a provision of this kind, that if any bill comes back from the Senate with an amendment which would have been out of order if it had been proposed on the floor of the House the House conferees shall not have power to assent to it until there has first been a vote in the House on each such amendment. I believe by that we will do a good deal to restore to the House of Representatives the power and responsibility that the Constitution lays upon our shoulders and which have gone elsewhere in the development of legislative methods in the Senate. [Applause.]

Now, the first thing we propose to do with regard to the preparation of the Book of Estimates is to provide a budget bureau in the office of the President, with a director and an assistant director and a staff sufficient to perform the work. Why in the office of the President? It seemed to your committee that if the budget staff were subordinate to the Secretary of the Treasury—and the other proposal was to have it in the Treasury Department—if the Secretary of the Treasury, through the budget staff, should revise estimates coming, say, from the Navy Department or the War Department or the Department of Agriculture, at a Cabinet meeting, probably the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of Agriculture would say to the Secretary of the Treasury, "How is it that you let a bureau chief in your department override my decisions about my department?" The Secretary of the Treasury has no authority over other members of the Cabinet. But if we put this budget bureau in the office of the President, put it in the office of the man who has jurisdiction over members of the Cabinet, then, if any member of the Cabinet attempts to override the budget suggested by the director of the budget bureau and approved by the President, it is not likely that that Cabinet Secretary would last very much longer in his office. We would put the preparation of the budget in the office of the man that has authority, and not in the hands of a man of equal rank with his associates.

One of the most important results in the preparation of the budget, as I believe, will come from the preparation of what in the bill is called the alternative budget. Under existing law estimates must be made each year according to the classification of the last year's appropriation. That is not exactly the language of the law, but that is the principle. The estimates are made and classified according to the classification of last year's appropriation. That is desirable in order to get a basis for comparing this year's appropriation with last year's work. How much did this bureau spend last year and how much do they ask this year? That is desirable. But if we never depart from that rule, we will never be able to get rid of the duplication and overlapping. If we are going to keep on doing a thing as it has always been done, there can be no improvement.

So the bill provides that for one year, the year ending 1922, the budget bureau shall prepare an alternative budget, with such classification and itemization as may seem to the President to be wise. If we adopt that or any part of it that year, then under existing law, which provides that the next year's estimates shall be classified according to this year's appropriations—if we adopt any of the new classifications proposed, that becomes the standard or regular classification for the next year. So the alternative budget merely covers the transition period.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the gentleman a question or two?

Mr. TEMPLE. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. There is something else to be guarded against besides duplication. That is overestimation. I would like to hear my colleague, who is well informed on this subject, in reference to that matter. Is it or not necessary that there should be some one inside the budget bureau who is acquainted with the different services, so that he can advise Congress in regard to it—some man in whom we have confidence—so that when he turns it over to Congress Congress will have some confidence that it has been thoroughly and well prepared? What bothers me the most and has given me more trouble than any other since I have been in Congress is these overestimates. When I have found that a bureau chief has asked two or three times more than he expected to get, I have disregarded his judgment and taken my own.

Mr. TEMPLE. That is why it is so desirable to have a budget bureau entirely outside of any of the spending departments. If the director were subject to the head of one spending department, he might give a little more liberal estimate to the bureaus in his own department. But it will be the duty of the budget staff to keep in touch with the work every day in the year and to see what is going on. Now, many, many times some service is asked for that we might like to provide for, but we say we must have a better-balanced budget. In making up the household budget you have to allow so much for rent, so much for food, so much for clothing, and so on. If you would like a better house, you say if we have that better house we will have to cut down on food or on clothing. A man in making up the household budget has to balance the spending in one department with that of another. We will have to do the same thing. In the preparation of the budget there must be authority to cut some estimates so as to form a well-balanced budget.

Mr. BUTLER. So we may anticipate that in this budget bureau there will be experts, men of knowledge on all technical matters with which they have to deal, and men in whom we will have confidence?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; men in whom we have confidence, but not confidence enough to make us shirk our own responsibility in the matter. Nothing that the budget bureau can do will relieve the Appropriations Committee, or the appropriating committees, of Congress from the responsibility of making investigations of their own, just as they do now, and handling that budget as we handle the Book of Estimates.

Mr. BUTLER. I should expect, after they reported the budget, on the committee on which I serve, that we would spend four months examining the estimates—four months in solid work.

Mr. TEMPLE. It is a good thing to have the stream of estimates filtered before it reaches the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. And thoroughly examined.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is one phase of this matter that I do not quite understand. It is the duty of the budget commission, or perhaps the President, to estimate as to the revenues. Suppose, for instance, the expenditures were ascertained to be a certain sum, and the available revenue is not sufficient to meet that sum, would it be mandatory on the budget commission or the President to suggest the means by which such revenue could be raised?

Mr. TEMPLE. The Constitution already provides that the President shall present to the Congress such discussion of the state of the Union as he may desire. Most Presidents have found it desirable to make suggestions about the revenue, whether tariff or income tax, or anything else. The Presidents will continue to do so, I have no doubt, and they will continue to do so in connection with the proposed budget of estimates for expenditures, but their suggestions will be no more mandatory on Congress than they have hitherto.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course not; but it would be mandatory or their duty in case the expenditures exceeded the anticipated revenue to make some recommendation.

Mr. TEMPLE. I do not know about the use of the word "mandatory." We can not compel the President to perform his duty. It will be his duty to do it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Take a situation such as confronts us this fiscal year. It appears that the expenditures for this fiscal year will be something over $10,000,000,000 and that our total receipts from all available sources will be not to exceed seven billions and a half. Under those circumstances what would be the duty of the budget bureau?

Mr. TEMPLE. I think it would be the duty of the President to bring the facts to the attention of Congress and suggest either revision of the revenue laws for the purpose of increasing the revenues or a bond issue. When I say that we have not the power to compel the President I am speaking in terms of a generation. It is not with regard to any particular President or any particular Congress, but Congress at no time has power to compel the President to perform his duties. The pressure of public opinion is efficacious on both Presidents and Congresses.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think in this bill, if I am not mistaken, the word "shall" is used with reference to this.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; that question was taken up with a former President of the United States, Mr. Taft, and he gave it as his judgment that it would be proper to make use of that word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. After all, when the budget is prepared and recommended and when the appropriating committee has passed upon that and submitted it to the House in a proper bill, then in Committee of the Whole each Member of Congress will function in passing upon the matter.

Mr. TEMPLE. Just exactly as he does now.

Mr. BLANTON. And will have the same right to be heard with respect to these recommendations and that proposed legislation as he has now.

Mr. TEMPLE. Precisely.

Mr. BLANTON. And the Committee of the Whole can make its impress on the proposed legislation just as it does now.

Mr. TEMPLE. Exactly. It was proposed to the Special Committee on the Budget that in our proposed revision of the rules of the House we include a provision that an amendment for an increase of an item offered by any Member on the floor will be out of order. We refused to incorporate any such provision in the proposed rules. There is no reason why the privileges, the rights of Members of Congress, or the rights of Congress as a whole should be diminished in the least.

Mr. BLANTON. But in no case would an amendment to decrease be out of order.

Mr. TEMPLE. No. That was the proposal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. TEMPLE. I have only one more point to cover, and that has been covered very completely by others, I think.

I have already dealt with the preparation of the budget. I have purposely referred only in a general way to the dealing with the budget by the committee or committees of the House under the proposed revision of the rules, though I firmly believe in the desirability of such a reorganization of the committees of the House as will enable the House to deal with the budget as a whole. The third thing provided in the program of the committee is this, that there shall be an independent audit, so that Congress, having made the appropriations, will follow them up and see how the money appropriated has been spent. At present the audit system is in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand this first proposal deals with the actual needs and necessities of government.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; just as the present Book of Estimates does, but we do hope to get a better and more trustworthy Book of Estimates.

Mr. BUTLER. The third with the audit and the second with a revision of the rules in order to better effectuate the purpose of the bill?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. On the second proposition we will meet some day.

Mr. TEMPLE. When the resolution providing for the change in the rules comes up.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; we will be at Philippi.

Mr. TEMPLE. That is not incorporated in this bill, because we do not want the Senate to have anything to do with the revision of the rules of the House any more than we want to interfere with the rules of the Senate.

It is thought desirable to have the audit made by an independent agency of the Government not under the control of any spending departments. The people who spend the money are not the proper people to audit the accounts. Of course, there will be an executive audit. Every disbursing officer will have to have proper accounts and in every one of the departments there will be the ordinary executive audits, but when we come to the independent audit, that agency ought to be under the control of the same authority that appropriates the money.

The Comptroller of the Treasury is now an officer in the Treasury Department, quite distinct, as everyone understands, from the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. The Comptroller of the Treasury will be removed from the Treasury Department and his title changed if this bill passes. He will thereafter be called the comptroller general of the United States. Also, the six auditors in the Treasury Department, the Auditor for the War Department, the Auditor for the Navy Department, the Auditor for the State and Other Departments, and all the others. They are not connected at all with the departments for which they audit, but are officers in the Treasury Department. They will also be removed from the Treasury Department and made a part of the working force in the office of the comptroller general of the United States. The Constitution provides the method for appointing officers of the United States. He will be appointed by the President with the confirmation of the Senate, but we have provided that he may be removed by concurrent resolution of Congress. A joint resolution has the effect of law, and has to be signed by the President. A concurrent resolution of the two Houses goes nowhere after it has passed the two Houses, and if the bill is passed this would give the legislative branch of the Government control of the audit, not through the power of appointment, but through the power of removal. It seems to me that the whole plan gets back to the scheme of the Constitution of the United States. It restores something of the power that Congress formerly had and ought to have, but which in practice has been largely taken over by the Executive. Also, with regard to the relation between the two Houses, it restores part of the power that the Constitution puts upon the House of Representatives when it provides that all revenue bills shall originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, do not the words "that the Senate shall have power to add amendments" practically nullify that right of the House?

Mr. TEMPLE. The Constitution itself provides that the Senate shall have the power to amend. I think there has been at least one instance in which the Senate amendment was practically this: They struck out everything after the enacting clause and inserted an entirely new bill. Is that in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution, which provides that a revenue bill shall originate in the House?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not believe it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman desire a little more time?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish the gentleman would give the gentleman from Pennsylvania a little more time.

Mr. GOOD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, when the first tariff bill came up here after the Democrats got possession of the House they did the very thing the gentleman is now talking about in the Senate with the tariff bill. Well, when it came up in the House Mr. MANN raised the point of order that that could not be done in the meaning of the words "that the Senate shall have the right to amend." Well, I told him this, that if I had been the Speaker of the First Congress when that question was first raised that I would have sustained his point of order, but that the people of the United States and both Houses of Congress had acquiesced in that sort of procedure for 122 years, and that it had become the habit of the House. Now, if it does not disturb the gentleman, they load up these House bills over there with every conceivable kind of amendment. I know at one time they sent the grab-bag bill over here, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and they added over $600,000 of amendments, old, bearded, gray-haired antiquated claims, several of which antedated the Revolution absolutely. [Laughter.] But I informed the conferees if they did not cut those $600,000 of claims out I was not going to appoint the conferees that night and I would let the whole thing go over. The vice of this whole extravagance of this is that the Members neglect to exercise the very power of which the gentleman was talking about a while ago, to raise the point that the thing is not germane or that it is not according to law, and so forth. That is one source, and the other source is the desire of the Senate to load down these bills with everything and then wait until just a day or two before Congress is going to adjourn and hold them up, thinking that the Members of the House will be so keen to get away that they will not block the game. Now, if we would make a rule in this House—I suppose we would have a tremendous row with the Senate if we did—but if we should make a rule in this House that no Senate amendment could be adopted by the House conferees unless it was germane in the House, then you would strike at the root of this extravagance, but you are not going to do it until you do that. [Applause.]

Now, I want to ask the gentleman—I do not want to take up all of his time, he is making a very interesting speech—will we be under any more obligation to follow the estimates and recommendations of this new-fangled board than we are to follow the estimates and recommendations of these various departments?

Mr. TEMPLE. Absolutely not; our powers will remain precisely as they are, but the issue may be a little more clearly defined. With regard to the amendment in the rules, the language proposed, though the legislation is not before the House just now, reads as follows:

To Rule XX, add an additional clause as follows:
"2. Any amendment of the Senate to a general appropriation bill which would be in violation of the provisions of clause 2 of Rule XXI, if said amendment had originated in the House, shall not be agreed to by the managers on the part of the House unless specific authority to agree to such amendment shall be first given by the House by a separate vote on every such amendment."

I think that would reach precisely the point of which the gentleman from Missouri was speaking.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not that largely the fact now? When an appropriation bill is sent over from the Senate with amendments added to it we consult with colleagues in the House before it goes to conference, and colleagues oftentimes ask that the conferees shall not agree to such and such an amendment until the House votes on it. Is not that largely the practice now?

Mr. TEMPLE. There may be a hazy sort of practice of that sort informally, but this will make it the formal rule of the House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, reference has been made a number of times during this debate to the great importance of this proposed legislation. It has been said that this is the most important measure the Congress has considered for many years. The creation of a Federal budget system involving, as it does, a radical change in our fiscal policy is of sufficient moment to challenge not only the attention of every Member of Congress but of every citizen of the Republic as well. The establishment of a budget system is a great reform for which there has been a growing demand. Like other great reforms, however, serious consideration has not been given it until necessity intervened. Prior to the war a few extra millions could be appropriated without affecting individual taxpayers. Now that the people are burdened with taxes and compelled to support the Government largely by direct taxation, the paying public has turned its attention toward Government expenditures. The creation of a budget system has been urged by economists and statesmen for many years. Both political parties have declared in favor of such a system. But, until now, the Congress of the United States has not undertaken to give serious consideration to the question. It has been my pleasure and privilege during the last few days to mingle with the people of my district. They are vitally interested in the curtailment of useless expenditures and are demanding a "return to that simplicity which befits a democratic Government." The people are demanding a reduction in the high cost of government as well as a reduction in the high cost of living. I am quite sure the people will welcome any change in the financial policy of their Government which will serve these ends. President Taft made an effort during his administration to establish a budget system. But until Congress recently authorized the appointment of this special committee to conduct hearings, study the question, and report a bill nothing definite has really been undertaken.

I want to express the very great appreciation I feel for the honor conferred upon me in being named a member of this special committee. I regard it as a privilege to have been able to sit with the distinguished members of this committee through the hearings and deliberations which have resulted in the presentation of this bill to the House. I realize that I have contributed little as a member of this committee and have received much. For this opportunity I want to publicly express my gratitude.

Before saying anything about the budget system, it would perhaps be better to say something concerning the evils the system is expected to cure. It is generally agreed that our present method of preparing and presenting the annual estimates of expenditures for the ensuing year is both unscientific and unbusinesslike. Under our present system the bureaus and boards of the various departments of the Government make up their own estimates early in the fall of the money they will need or desire to spend for the coming fiscal year. These estimates are prepared without regard for the financial condition of the country and without regard for estimated revenues. As an illustration I will take the Department of Agriculture, since I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and know something of its method of making appropriations. The Department of Agriculture has many bureaus under it, such as the Forest Service, Bureau of Chemistry, Bureau of Plant Industry, Bureau of Animal Industry, Weather Bureau, Department of Farm Management, Bureau of Soils, Bureau of Entomology, Bureau of Biological Survey, Bureau of Publications, Bureau of Crop Estimates, States Relations Service, Bureau of Public Roads, Bureau of Markets, Insecticide and Fungicide Board, Federal Horticultural Board, as well as numerous other lesser activities. As stated, these several bureaus or boards prepare in the early fall their own estimates of the money needed for their several departments during the coming year. Each bureau chief or board head is naturally enthusiastic over the work of his organization. He desires to see it expand and grow. He therefore includes in his estimate of expenditures not only the actual needs of his department but also incorporates in dollars and cents his desires and ambitions for the future. Under our present system he does more than that.

He knows from experience that when his estimate reaches Congress it will be materially reduced. He therefore increases his estimate in anticipation of a substantial cut by Congress. These estimates from the various bureaus are next submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture, who is the department head. He then has in his possession the estimates for all of the money the Department of Agriculture desires to expend during the coming fiscal year. It is perfectly clear that the Secretary of Agriculture can not give to these estimates the close, businesslike scrutiny that is desired. He has no organizaton or machinery by which he can determine the correctness of the estimates. He must depend upon the heads of his various bureaus, and it necessarily follows that he must accept their estimates at their face value. He naturally gives them his formal approval. In doing so he relies upon Congress to scrutinize the estimates and determine their merit. He trusts the Committee on Agriculture to go over the estimates item by item and finally pass upon them. The Committee on Agriculture and the Congress itself must therefore bear the full responsibility for such appropriations as may be made.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not the custom for the Committee on Agriculture and other committees of the House to call before them the very men who made these estimates in the first place?

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. TILSON. And, as a rule, nobody else is called upon except some one in that particular bureau?

Mr. PURNELL. Let me say in furtherance of that thought that the very thing that happens is that these men who have previously prepared the estimates come up with additional arguments to show that they ought to be adopted.

Mr. TILSON. And they are well prepared and buttressed with arguments, whereas the honest Member of Congress who is trying to investigate this particular bureau is handicapped by lack of information?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes; he is at a decided disadvantage. Members of the Committee on Agriculture do not and can not be expected to have that full knowledge of the needs of this department that should be present in those charged with the duty of finally passing upon them. It is a physical impossibility for members of the committee or of the House to go over these various items were they qualified to do so. Herein lies the most serious objection to our present system. There is no fixed responsibility for the estimates. The people, who, after all, must pay the bills, do not know whether the executive or legislative branch of the Government should be held responsible for the expenditure of public money. Too often the public places that responsibility upon the Congress of the United States, when, as a matter of fact, those who prepare the estimates should bear the responsibility. The truth is, as was clearly developed during the hearings before this committee, the Congress is in reality the economical branch of the Government. Covering a period of 20 years the Congress has, with but two or three exceptions, reduced the annual estimates as presented by the Executive. There is a general feeling that the Congress is extravagant and wasteful, when, as a matter of fact, it is the watchdog of the Treasury.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] touched upon this point admirably a while ago when he gave a concrete example covering a period of 20 years. The Congress has, with but two single exceptions, and one of those doubtful, reduced the annual estimates presented by the executive branch of the Government. Now, I know there is a general feeling over the country—I have met it in my district and I dare say every Member here has met it in his—a feeling that the Congress of the United States is the profligate branch of the Government, when, as a matter of fact, the Congress of the United States is really the money-saving branch.

That which is true of the Agricultural Department is, of course, true of every other department of the Government. After the Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of War, Secretary of State, the Postmaster General, Secretary of Labor, and the other department heads have collected the estimates from their various bureau chiefs they are by law required to submit them to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury is required by law to compile and print these various requests in what is known as the Book of Estimates. This is done not later than October 15 of each year. In this connection it is well to remember that the Secretary of the Treasury has no power whatever to increase or decrease the estimates. He has no power to even suggest a revision. He acts in a clerical capacity only.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. With pleasure.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will you please cite the law that makes it impossible for the Secretary and the heads of the departments to make a reduction of these estimates?

Mr. PURNELL. I will say to the gentleman that I can not cite the law, but from almost every witness who appeared before our committee we traced the Book of Estimates from the various bureau heads until it reached the Congress of the United States, and without an exception we were told that the Secretary of the Treasury had absolutely no authority whatever to revise, criticize, suggest revision, or change, but that his duty was purely clerical and consisted merely in compiling that which was given to him by the various department heads of the Government.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Let me take just a moment more. I will say that the reverse opinion prevailed in the department during the 18 years I was there, and I know it operated.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman had 18 years experience and appeared before our committee and gave us a great deal of valuable information. Is the statement that I have just made correct, that the Secretary of the Treasury has no power to revise?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I do not concur in that view, because I know at times he has revised and reduced.

Mr. PURNELL. Let me ask the gentleman if that is the general practice?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I can not answer as to any cases aside from those I know. I would not presume to say what people had done when I was not there and cases I did not know about. I simply wanted the citation of the law under which it is impossible for the Secretary to do these things. If there is such a law, I would like to find it, and I took it for granted that the gentleman would be able to cite the statute. That was the reason for my question.

Mr. PURNELL. I will say to the gentleman that I made that statement upon the authority of the numerous gentlemen who appeared before our special committee and made the statement.

At the beginning of each regular session of Congress in December these estimates are by law required to be submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress. It is plain to be seen that when these estimates reach Congress they do not in any particular represent the real, rock-bottom financial needs of the Government. They do not represent an honest estimate of these needs. What Congress should get is a bed-rock estimate of governmental needs for the coming year. What it really gets in the Book of Estimates is real needs plus aspirations, ambitions, and anticipation of reduction by Congress all expressed in terms of finance.

The next step in the present system is the consideration of the estimates by the various appropriating committees and the passage of bills to meet the needs. In the early years of our Government the estimates were submitted to one committee and were considered by Congress in a single appropriation bill. As the country increased in population and wealth the duties of Congress increased until we now have 14 annual appropriation bills. Eight committees now prepare and report appropriation bills. The Committee on Agriculture appropriates for the Department of Agriculture; the Military Affairs Committee appropriates for the War Department; the Naval Affairs Committee appropriates for the Navy Department; the Committee on Foreign Affairs appropriates for the Diplomatic and Consular Service; the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads appropriates for the Postal Service; the Committee on Indian Affairs appropriates for the Indian Service; the Committee on Rivers and Harbors appropriates for internal waterways and harbor improvements; and the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction over the following six bills for the support of the Government: First, the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, providing for the salary and certain other expenditures of the departments; second, the sundry civil expense bill; third, the fortifications and coast-defense bill; fourth, the District of Columbia bill; fifth, the pensions bill; sixth, all bills providing for deficiencies in any of the Government departments. These deficiency bills are always necessary, because the departments do not always get what they need in the first place, and also because unforeseen circumstances frequently arise necessitating increased expenditures. The several appropriating committees conduct hearings and determine as far as possible the real merits of the several estimates, but it is clear that no committee, however careful it may be, can really know the true merit of the demands made. A bill is finally agreed upon by the committee and reported to the House for consideration.

Another objection to our system is that the several appropriating committees appropriate money without any regard to any general financial policies. The Secretary of the Treasury is not consulted by any of the committees to determine what effect any bill will have on the Public Treasury. The Executive being without responsibility in the matter of preparing a financial program has no financial policy. Congress itself has no financial policy other than the general desire and determination to reduce rather than increase estimates. The Ways and Means Committee has jurisdiction over all bills relating to the raising of revenue. There is no connection whatever between the Ways and Means Committee, which raises the revenue, and the appropriating committees, which provide for its expenditure. It is therefore quite clear that these various processes are carried on from year to year without regard for any general financial policy on the part of either executive or legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman please yield for a question?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under the topic that you are now discussing I would imagine that the lump-sum appropriations are allowed or made. Now, does this budget system provide for any check upon lump-sum appropriations, giving free hand to spend a certain amount that is not specified or the use of which is not designated when the appropriation is made? Is there any check on that in this system proposed?

Mr. PURNELL. I would not undertake to answer the gentleman's question by yes or no. But this system that we hope to adopt by this bill will put responsibility on somebody at every stage of the proceedings, and that is the thing that has been lacking heretofore. Departments have requested money, the President has transmitted the requests to us, and we have appropriated money, and the people have never known who was directly responsible for it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the item always be specified for which the appropriation is to be made?

Mr. PURNELL. In the budget as it comes to Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. Absolutely; yes, sir. The question as to just how far down the line this budget shall go is one that was discussed in the committee, and I am not sure that it has been definitely determined; but, as far as I am concerned, I would be glad to have it go down to the individual clerks, so that those who are charged with the responsibility of passing upon the budget will know absolutely whether or not the thing asked for is actually needed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To know what it is for?

Mr. PURNELL. Certainly.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Certainly.

Mr. RICKETTS. It has been the practice of Congress, as I understand it, in making appropriations to give lump-sum appropriations to the heads of the departments for miscellaneous purposes. Does the gentleman think that a good practice?

Mr. PURNELL. I do not.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does the gentleman think by the adoption of this law and the enactment of this legislation that that can be prevented?

Mr. PURNELL. I do.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Is there anything in the law, however, which in itself prevents that; and, if so, what?

Mr. PURNELL. You mean in this particular law?

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Yes; in this particular law.

Mr. PURNELL. No; there is not.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. It must be a policy to be developed?

Mr. PURNELL. This is the skeleton of a basic plan, and experience will help us add to it and work out the details.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. With reference to the responsibility which the gentleman has just suggested, in what way will this law fasten the responsibility for an estimate on a bureau or department that the present law does not?

Mr. PURNELL. Well, I will be glad to answer the gentleman's question.

Under the present system it is pretty hard to say where responsibility lies. The head of a bureau, who is enthusiastic about the work of his particular bureau—and, as Dr. TEMPLE very well said a moment ago, that is a commendable trait—includes in his estimate when he prepares it in the fall, not only his real needs but his hopes and ambitions for the future, and, as I said a moment ago, he adds to it more than that. He knows from experience he will get a substantial cut when he comes up here, and he adds to his absolute needs and his hopes and ambitions the substantial cut which he expects to get, and expresses it all in dollars and cents. He passes that on to the head of his department, for instance, the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture has the power, perhaps, to whittle it down, but the ties of friendship, association, and politics sometimes forbid that, I am sure; so it is passed from the Secretary of Agriculture to the Secretary of the Treasury, who acts in a clerical capacity and compiles it with other estimates and incorporates it in the Book of Estimates. Now then, where is the responsibility? Is it on the bureau heads? Is it on the Secretary of Agriculture? Is it on the President of the United States? Or is it on Congress? We do not know. But I will say to you that under this proposed bill the responsibility will be determinable at every stage in the proceeding, because we are going to fix responsibility, in the first instance, upon the President, to say exactly what money is needed and what money is not needed for the running of the Government, and whenever he incorporates that in his budget and turns it over to this body, that responsibility immediately goes from his shoulders to our shoulders.

Now, we did not want to handicap the President or tie his hands in any particular, and we have tried to give him under this bill all of the machinery necessary to determine exactly what the Government will need.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PURNELL. I will be glad to.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I am for the bill and I am going to vote for it, but I think we are expecting it to be a panacea for ills that will never be cured. Has not the head of the bureau just as much responsibility now as he will have under this law if adopted? Why will not he operate exactly under the same motive as he does now? And along with it the President now has the power to cut estimates, and, of course, could, if he had the machinery; and why could he not empower the Secretary of the Treasury, outside of the Secretary's own estimates, to do that very thing?

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman has answered his own question. He has the power but he has not the machinery.

Besides that, let me suggest something else: None of us overlook the value of public sentiment, do we? If the people of the United States, from whose pockets we take the money to defray the expenses of the Government, know in every instance who is responsible for handling it and doling it out—if we are successful in bringing about that condition—we shall have gone far toward removing the evils that exist to-day. Of course, I do not contend, nor do any of the older members on this committee, who have had a greater number of years' experience, contend, that this bill, if adopted, will of itself from the very first moment of its adoption prove a panacea for all the ills from which we suffer, but it is a starting point.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. PURNELL. I will be glad to. I will try to answer any question the gentleman propounds.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I do not want to put the gentleman to the test, because I know he could do it. But I want to make this observation: I have known of numerous instances in which heads of departments have gone to the White House for the indorsement of questions of large extensions of appropriations, and I have never known of an instance in which they failed to get what they went for.

Mr. PURNELL. I have no doubt but that the gentleman is correct.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for one question?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. For many years—for 15 years, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] has shown—it has been within the power of the President to reduce the estimates of his department chiefs, and they have come in here and have been reduced by Congress many hundreds of millions of dollars in the last 16 years, and yet the notion has gone out through the newspapers and magazines and all over the country that Congress has been the responsible one and the extravagant one. How does the gentleman propose by this bill to cure that? Does he expect in future that the people will lay the charge where it belongs, or go on in the same blissful state of ignorance that they have been in in the last 15 or 20 years?

Mr. PURNELL. I think I can answer the gentleman's question by one simple announcement, and that is that this bill fixes the responsibility for the expenditure of Government funds. I believe it absolutely fixes that responsibility, and with that responsibility fixed and determined, I will trust the American people to keep in mind those who are responsible. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. May I have some more time, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. GOOD. The time is nearly all gone, but I will yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. PURNELL. I thank the gentleman.

I have only hinted at some of the objections to our present system. They can well be summed up with the statement that there is now no fixed responsibility for the estimates and no coordination in the raising and spending of the public funds. The budget system is offered as a remedy for these evils. It is believed that the adoption of a budget system will not only result in fixing responsibility and coordinating the financial operations of the Government, but that it will prevent waste, overlapping, duplication, and extravagance.

What is the budget system? The word "budget" is derived from the French word "bougette" which translated means "a little bag." It is a term used in dealing with the raising and expending of money by local or national governments, corporations, or other bodies which have to deal with questions of this kind. The term was first used by the British. The pouch in which the chancellor of the exchequer carried his financial papers to Parliament was called "the budget."

The essential elements of a budget system that can be applied under our form of government are as follows: First, the preparation of the annual estimates; second, the procedure in Congress in relation to the estimates; and, third, a control over the expenditures through an organization with power of control and audit.

This bill provides that the President shall bear full responsibility for all estimates submitted to Congress. He shall be charged with the duty of saying to Congress and the public as well just what money is needed to run the Government for the ensuing year. It is hoped that his presentation of the budget to Congress will be an annual event; that it will serve to focus the public mind upon Government finances, and that the public will follow the progress of the budget from the time it leaves the President's hands until it has been increased, decreased, or accepted by the legislative branch of the Government. It will clearly fix upon the Executive a responsibility that is now divided. I regard this as the one great thing to be accomplished by this bill. In fixing responsibility upon the President we have taken every precaution to see that his hands shall be perfectly free and that he shall be limited only by the consciousness of that responsibility. We have provided him with all necessary machinery to determine the real needs of the Government. The bill provides for the creation of a bureau of the budget in the office of the President, with a director and assistant director, to be appointed by him and removable at his will. It is provided that the director and assistant director shall receive salaries of $10,000 and $7,500 a year, respectively. It is hoped that through years of experience and opportunity to know there will grow up in the bureau of the budget an efficient corps of trained experts, whose tenure of office shall be indefinite and whose desire to serve the Government shall not be hampered or affected by any change of administration. It will be the duty of the budget bureau to provide the President with a broad, comprehensive view of the finances and needs of the Government, which he has heretofore been unable to get. The budget, when submitted by the President to Congress, will contain not only a statement of proposed expenditures but also an estimate of revenues. If extravagance, waste, and duplication exist, the President will be held to strict accountability for their continuation.

The second step in the proposed legislation is the consideration of the budget by Congress. With the submission of the budget to Congress by the President that body assumes full responsibility. It is no longer an Executive budget, but is a legislative budget. If the estimates as submitted are reduced by Congress, it will be for the people to determine whether the presidential demands were extravagant or whether the Congress is short-sighted and niggardly. On the other hand, if the estimates of the President be increased by Congress, an issue will at once be made which the people will have an opportunity to pass upon at the next election. Much has been said concerning the British system, which does not permit an increase of the estimates as submitted. Such a plan, in my judgment, is not in harmony with our theory of government, and should not be incorporated in our system. This is a government of the people and by the people, and we are their direct representatives. They ask for no greater safeguard than to know where responsibility lies. This bill will give them that protection.

I shall not enter into a discussion at this time of the proposed change in the rules of the House, although it seems to have been made an issue in this debate. That question does not properly enter into the establishment of budgetary legislation. That is a matter for future consideration. I want to say in passing, however, that we can not help but be considered derelict in our duty if we vote to regulate the executive branch of the Government and refuse to regulate ourselves. It is sufficient to say at this time that it was the unanimous judgment of the committee that this bill as reported should be enacted into law.

The third step, and a most important one, is the audit and control of the expenditures of the Government. Heretofore the executive branch of the Government has occupied the awkward position of auditing its own accounts. All are agreed that this is wrong in principle. It was the unanimous judgment of the committee that the power of audit and control should be lodged with the legislative rather than the spending branch of the Government. We propose to clothe the Executive with full power to survey and determine the financial needs of the Government as well as make estimates therefor. We reserve to the Congress the power of making the appropriations and of seeing that the money is properly spent. This bill provides for an officer to be known as the comptroller general, whose duty it shall be to audit and pass upon the legality of all Government expenditures. He shall be responsible only to Congress and shall be removable by Congress alone, and then only for cause. He and his assistant are to be appointed by the President, with the approval and consent of the Senate. The creation of this independent auditing department will accomplish three things. It will serve to keep the Congress informed as to actual conditions surrounding the expenditure of public funds. It will serve as a check on the President in the preparation of the budget. It will require every Cabinet officer and department head to make a study of his department and know its real financial needs.

These are, in brief, the salient features of the proposed bill. The enactment of this bill and the creation of a budget system for the Federal Government will mark a great epoch in the history of the Nation. It will go far toward the prevention of waste, extravagance, and duplication. It will result in a great saving to the people from whose pockets the Government must take the money to carry on its operations. If it does nothing more than fix responsibility in the expenditure of their money, we will have earned the thanks of a grateful people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman's request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not think I shall use anything like 20 minutes. I did not come to make a speech; I shall only submit a few remarks.

I think the benefits to be derived from this legislation, like the reports of Mr. Bryan's political death, have been very much exaggerated. I shall support the measure because of the manifest need for a change in the present method of submitting estimates, but I am not as sanguine with reference to it as a great many who have spoken seem to be. Because of the apparent success of the plan elsewhere it deserves a trial, and I think it will prove of merit. But there is no need of raising false hopes or deceiving ourselves into believing it a panacea for all national ills. It provides for a budget system; that is, the submitting of estimates through the office of the President. But he can do everything, if I understand the situation correctly, at the present time, that he can do under the terms of this bill. Therefore practically all that is to be accomplished by the provisions of the bill that is before the House is to provide the machinery of a few directors and clerks to carry out what he already has the power to do, and to lay the predicate for additional legislation in the future.

Now, of course everyone realizes that it is important to have economy in the affairs of government. I have not been a Member of Congress long, but for a number of years I have kept up, in a general way, with the proceedings here. During that time I have in a number of instances read the recommendations of a President of the United States, but I have not in a single instance known a President in his message to recommend to Congress the cutting down of any estimated appropriation for any department. Have you?

Now, the statement has been repeated frequently in the discussion of this measure that it fixes the responsibility. I sincerely hope this may be the effect. The furnishing of a central channel through which all estimates must pass, and the placing of expert directors in charge should at least obviate some of the duplication of work now being done by some of the departments, and to this extent at least the system possesses real merit.

I expect to support this measure in the hope that it may accomplish something of value.

I do not see how it can do any particular harm. But when you come to a presidential election, how much attention is paid to the expenses of the Government? There are other issues which control presidential elections—the question of preparedness, the question of Panama Canal tolls, or reciprocity, or the tariff, or some of those other issues. Of course, both parties accuse each other of extravagance, or, rather, the out party always accuses the in party with being extravagant, but they are never specific in their charges in national campaigns; and that issue will not be made in presidential elections, in so far as the practical side of the question is concerned. The President is in a position whereby he can use the various departments that are created for the purpose of carrying on his own policies, of extending his own powers—they are creatures of his own creation—and of creating and establishing and maintaining his own prestige. I am speaking impersonally now, and through the history of the Government the President has in many instances recommended the creation of additional bureaus, or the extension of others already under way, but not their elimination.

What I want to say particularly is this: That this is but a step, as has already been said by some members of the special committee—and they have done fine work; I want to say that—but this is but a step to more legislation, which means the concentration of additional powers in the House of Representatives in the hands of a few men. It is proposed to create a committee of 35 members to have practical control of the legislation, in so far as legislation is concerned, in this country. It is now being done by committees consisting of over 100 members, and they are busy every day in the year working on estimates.

Now, listen: It is true that hearings are to be conducted by the various committees, but when you deprive a committee of the power to recommend appropriations, by that very act you take away the incentive to conduct the investigations, and practically all the investigations with reference to appropriations will be made by this committee of 35. I submit that they will not know as much about the Indian affairs appropriations or river and harbor appropriations or Army and Navy appropriations as the present committees would know. It is all right to have a single budget recommended through the office of the President in order to fix the responsibility.

But when it gets up here it ought to be broken up among the various committees, so that the different members could be at work. There is too much work concentrated in some of the committees of the House now. Take, for instance, as an illustration of the very thing that will be accomplished by this change, the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House. I submit that that committee should be broken up into two or three committees. That may not be a popular thing to say, but it is true nevertheless. Take the Calendar of the House. All the bills on that calendar reported to the House were reported by 17 committees, when there are more than 50 committees of the House. Practically half the important legislation of the Congress is reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I have no objection to that. It is a fine committee, and it does fine work. But let me make a suggestion. The word "commerce" is too broad. It ought to be broken up, for instance, into a committee on transportation, a committee on insurance, a committee on corporations, and others. I do not know that I can name all the different things—in fact, I do not know whether any of the suggested names are proper—but there are a number of different subdivisions that go to make up the subjects considered by that committee. Commerce is generally used to mean half the important affairs of this country. Now, just as an illustration, if we had had a committee on transportation, so that at the beginning of this year they could have gone into the consideration of railway matters, the railway bill could have been reported by the 1st day of July and that matter have been disposed of by this body before this date. Other legislation also could have been in a greater degree of completion than we have it at the present time.

Take the various questions that come up, and if you parcel them out among the Members of the House you will get efficient and well-considered legislation to a greater degree than you get it at the present time.

Right near the close of the last session a recommendation was brought in here that $750,000,000 be appropriated to continue the operation of the railroads of this country. I heard the chairman of that committee, Hon. Swagar Sherley, of Kentucky, who is no longer a Member of the House but who was one of its hardest workers and most efficient Members, say that he had three days in which to have hearings on that $750,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. CANNON. That was on a deficiency bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The hearings were conducted by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. Would you have a dozen men on a deficiency bill?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would not assign men to a particular bill, but rather assign the bill to a committee. I will ask the gentleman this: In this House of 435 Members would the gentleman take all the legislation and put it in the hands of one committee and let the others stand out until that committee had finished, when it could not do half the work?

Mr. CANNON. May I have half a minute to answer?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The committees of this House are clothed with power to legislate, and the legislation goes as riders upon appropriation bills, and that leads to extravagance. If those committees would perform their duties and pay more attention to legislation, the appropriations would follow the legislation, where the House had intelligently considered it and it had been intelligently prepared.

Mr. JONES of Texas. What the gentleman says is true, and it is a bad practice to attach legislation onto appropriation bills, but this bill will not cure that. On the other hand, I think it will encourage it, because you will have one great committee here that will have all the appropriations. They will have absolute power, and you can not fight them much, because they will have control of appropriations, and they will be tying legislation onto appropriation bills more than ever unless we amend the rules, or rather unless we enforce the rules.

Mr. CANNON. The great committee of the House that can consider legislation most intelligently is the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. There are the 435 members of that committee. I have been a young Member of Congress and I have been an old Member of Congress, and let me say to the gentleman that this greatest of all committees rarely commands a quorum. It takes two terms and sometimes three terms, and sometimes never, for a Member of Congress to have a conception of his duty.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman was a Member of Congress several years before I was born, and, consequently, he knows a great deal more about legislation than I know. I have read of him since boyhood. I have great confidence in his judgment, and I know that my experience is not as ripe as his. I know that my judgment is not as good as his; but I have read this bill carefully, and within the four corners of this paper I can not find a single sentence that will correct the evils he has suggested.

Mr. CANNON. I concede the gentleman's industry and his ability as well, and I am serious when I say that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I thank the gentleman. I was not asking for a compliment.

Mr. CANNON. It is true nevertheless.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I thank the gentleman. When we have one committee of 35, which has practically all the responsibility of this House, we will have a smaller attendance than when we have a little more responsibility placed on the shoulders of the men who constitute the House. [Applause.] I can show you men who came here within the limit of my experience, wanting to do something and expecting to do their best in connection with the legislation of Congress. Yet because they happened to be assigned to a committee which had nothing to do, because when they came here some committee which had control of the legislation had practically all the time, they have in a measure lost interest, and simply proceed to vote on the various propositions that come up. I recognize the difficulties that the gentleman has suggested, but I do not see how they can be corrected by this legislation.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will yield, I want to emphasize what he is saying, that it is especially true at the short session of Congress, when we have only three months and when nothing is passed except the appropriation bills. Now, what would the other 400 Members of this House who were not on the committee of 35 do during a short session of Congress, when no other legislation is enacted except the appropriation bills? Of course, having nothing to do here themselves, and having no responsibility, a great many of them will not be here, and I doubt if you would have a quorum here in Washington.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think that statement is well made; but the principal thing I am trying to emphasize is that one committee of 35 men absolutely can not conduct the hearings that are necessary to make the appropriations to run this Government, with this extensive work that is being done by the various departments and the various activities that are being conducted by the various bureaus and institutions which this Government has created.

Mr. PURNELL. Of course the gentleman understands that the question of changing the rules of the House is entirely separate from the proposed legislation that is before the House?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I recognize that, and it is just like the last 5 miles of a man's journey to a town that is 10 miles away. The gentleman in his own speech here a few minutes ago suggested that if we reformed the executive department and did not reform ourselves, we would be shown in a bad light. That was the substance of what he said a while ago, and the enactment of this bill calls for the changing of the rules, does it not?

Mr. PURNELL. It does not necessarily call for it. I want to express my individual opinion that we would be lax in our duty if we regulated the executive branch of the Government and did not regulate ourselves.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman expect to make an argument along that line when the other proposition comes up?

Mr. PURNELL. I expect to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. And I have an idea that the gentleman will elaborate on it considerably. Therefore the bills are inextricably yoked together; the one is a part of the other in effect and one is a step in a two-step journey.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. I think somebody ought to make this statement in fairness to the committee that had the matter in charge: There was no attempt to conceal anything, and that is why the two were reported together, because we wanted to be fair to the membership of the House. I do not believe there is any desire to try to concentrate power in any place unnecessarily.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I thank the gentleman; if anything I have said would have that interpretation or meaning, I want to withdraw any such suggestion or imputation. I think the committee did a fine lot of work. I have read a considerable part of the hearings, not all, and I congratulate the committee not only on the work but the form and manner in which they presented it to the House for consideration. Nevertheless, when they have finished their work, the responsibility of the House commences, and we can not have this legislation properly considered unless it is properly discussed.

I maintain that perhaps you have accomplished something in providing the machinery whereby the President of the United States may have uniform estimates; you may do away with some of the overlapping in the different departments where one department does a little work that is done in some other department; but I submit to you that the chance of getting economy in this Government, the chance of reducing the expenses of this Government comes from a determination of the people whom you and I as Members of Congress go back to for reelection and they ask about these various things, and not in a presidential election, when great issues overshadow this particular issue.

Therefore in the future, as in the past, the economy of Government expenditure will be in the House of Representatives, and not with the President. As a direct corollary of that I say that whenever you place too much power in the hands of a single committee you do away with the tendency to economy in the Government expenditures and rather increase that tendency. This is true because one committee can not possibly have as extensive hearings on each subject as that subject deserves.

A moment ago I referred to the $750,000,000 railway appropriation which was brought in at the end of a three days' hearing. What did the chairman of the committee say was the reason for that? The recommendation was made five or six weeks before the bill was reported. His reason was that the other appropriation bills were calling for the attention of members on the Appropriation Committee and that the committee was overworked. The chairman himself said that he had been working day and night for weeks and weeks on the six appropriation bills which that committee considered, and I personally know his statement was true. Now, it is the purpose of the Congress, if this legislation is enacted in its finality as recommended by this committee, to not only have these six appropriation bills centered in one committee, but to have all the others with it, and have the other committees shorn of their right to pass appropriation legislation. That would still further centralize the power and cause the appropriation legislation to be less considered in the future than it has been in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I expect to support this bill, but I wish to speak briefly upon another subject.

It has been a great surprise to me to find that a number of newspapers in North Dakota have come out strongly in favor of the Plumb plan for Government ownership of railways. Ours is an agricultural State. We have no manufacturing to speak of. For the life of me I can not see how a farmer can receive any benefit out of the Plumb plan. It would ruin him, to my mind, if applied to railways, coal mines, and other industries. This proposition is new. Few people have given it thought. Those farmers who have considered it are, so far as I can learn, opposed to it. When the farmers learn what it means they will not touch it with a hundred-foot pole.

Mr. Chairman, when the Plumb plan is mentioned one is apt to think of it as applied only to the Government ownership of railways. It is proposed to apply it to many industries. The coal miners have declared for it, and in the meantime are threatening to strike if they are not granted a six-hour day, a five-day week, time and a half for overtime, double time for Sundays, and on top of all a 60 per cent increase in wages. That is their notion of how much work they should do and how much they should be paid, and, presumably, if they were to get complete control of the coal industry, by means of the Plumb plan, they would give themselves that kind of a layout, provided in the meantime their notions of pay and hours of labor had not become more pronounced.

The world will starve to death if placed upon the six-hour day. That is why it is economically unsound. Do you suppose for a minute that hired men are going to stay on the farm to work 12 hours a day when they can get more money by working 6 hours per day plus two holidays each week in the town or city? How are you going to keep them from going to the cities after the millennium has been established in the transportation and manufacturing industries?

And will the owners remain on the farms? They will not. Already there is a decided movement upon the part of farm labor to the cities, and already the owners are facing an era of falling prices for their products and increased costs in every direction. Owners of farms are leaving them even when they can not find tenants. They say they can make more as workers in manufacturing plants. I personally know of many such deserted farms near my old home in Michigan. We could not rent our old farm in Michigan for the past two years for this very reason.

Mr. Chairman, the Plumb plan has no place in this Republic. This is a Government of, by, and for the people—the whole people. Mr. Plumb proposes that the Government shall buy industries and turn them over for the benefit of a certain class. It is unsound. It is un-American. It will, among others, ruin the farmers. When they are all enticed from the farms to the cities by big wages and short hours and the farms are deserted, they and their Plumb-plan brothers will die of hunger.

Although Mr. Plumb holds out some hopes of certain profits to be generously shared with the public, it can not be denied that his philosophy and that of men like him is in the direction of decreased production, more pay, shorter hours, less work, more men, and more votes.

Farmers never strike. They will not do so. But if the Plumb plan in industry prevails, one by one they will nail boards over the windows of their homes and quietly leave the farms. When that time comes the truth may dawn upon people of the Plumb variety, if they survive the calamity brought upon themselves and their fellow men.

My views upon this subject are set forth in greater detail in a letter written by me and printed in several North Dakota newspapers. I ask leave to print this letter in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

YOUNG SAYS GO SLOW.

"WASHINGTON, October 1.

"Congressman GEORGE M. YOUNG, of North Dakota, has written a letter to a Barnes County farmer in which he takes a decided stand against the Plumb plan for Government ownership of railways and advises farmers to go slow. He says:

"'My study of this question has convinced me that the Plumb plan for ownership of railways is uneconomic and that it would be injurious to the public generally, and particularly to the farmers. The plan proposed by Mr. Plumb briefly stated is for the Government to purchase all the railways and turn them over to a board made up of two-thirds railway employees, one-third working in the general offices, and one-third working along the railway lines, thus giving the employees control of the business.

"'Let us run this proposition over briefly. You are a farmer. Transportation is the biggest of all farm questions. The balance sheet is influenced more by freight rates than by any other item. Freight rates mean more to agriculture than to any other industry.

FARMER PAYS FREIGHT BOTH WAYS.

"'Farmers pay the freight both ways. Just now it is difficult to determine where the price of wheat is fixed. In time of peace it is Liverpool, the Minneapolis price being Liverpool carriage charges off. In other words, the farmers pay the freight in time of peace through to Liverpool, and pay similarly upon other farm products through to the ultimate place where prices are fixed. They also pay the freight upon all merchandise and machinery purchased. For their thrashing rig they pay the Michigan price plus freight; for the auto, Detroit price, freight added; and upon the same basis for every implement used on the farm. It is even worse than that.

"'All the freight paid, say by Mr. Ford, in assembling the material for his cars is made a part of his price, and so with all other manufacturers of articles or implements for farm use. The items are mentioned by me in the most brief way, but you will readily understand what tremendous factors they are in the yearly expense of farmers. The same is true as to their purchases of merchandise. The factory adds freight in assembling materials to the cost of production, Minneapolis and Fargo jobbers add freight from the factory to their price, and the local merchant adds to his price the freight from Minneapolis or Fargo. No farmer can afford to brush this question aside with the thought that it is one for some one else to decide. The item of freight catches the farmer both going and coming. It means his very existence. Jones, who achieved celebrity by reason of having paid the freight, must have lived on a farm.

A TIME FOR SOBER THOUGHT—PRICES WILL DROP.

"'There is another thing which farmers must take into account. After the conclusion of peace agriculture will be one of the first industries throughout the world to return to normal conditions. The Government will not guarantee a price for wheat, and farmers will not be able to fix a price for it. It will be governed in large part by the law of supply and demand. The same will be true of other farm products and the prices may fall surprisingly low. I did not begin growing wheat as long ago as you, and have not sold it as cheap as you, but most that I have raised has been sold for less than a dollar per bushel. Farmers must face lower price levels for their products. Butter will go down; eggs will drop; the price of wool, wheat, and coarse grains will shrink. It behooves us to take thought of the future. While there may be serious times ahead for all, there is special danger in the situation which may confront farmers. It is a time when Members of Congress should realize their responsibility, and it is likewise a time when those at home who advise them should also feel their responsibility and prepare themselves to give a just and patriotic verdict.

EASIER TO GET IN THAN OUT.

"'The farmer who has been in doubt as to the wisdom of State ownership may have concluded that it was worth experimenting, and that if a failure the State could stand its loss and get out of business. It will not do to follow any such philosophy in respect to National Government ownership. The farmers, who have the biggest financial stake in North Dakota, are in the majority. They have the power to vote themselves out of any proposition into which they have voted themselves if they find it is losing money or is out of harmony with sound principles of government. Not so in the case of National Government ownership. They will not have the power to vote it out, because they are in the minority. Farmers who clamored for national grading of grain would be mighty glad to get out of it now. It looks as though that door is closed for all time, and it should serve as a warning that it is sometimes easier to get in than to get out.

RAILWAYS WILL PAY NO TAXES.

"'Another important fact to bear in mind is that in the event of Government ownership the railways would pay no taxes. This would increase the taxes upon farm lands and all other property. Would the freight rates be correspondingly reduced? My belief is they would not.

TO SAFEGUARD AGRICULTURE.

"'I want to do the right thing by all the people of my congressional district, and believe I can serve them best by helping to safeguard the interests of agriculture. It is a time to go slow. The men who come to us with a proposition that if we will support Government ownership of railways, they will save us money in freight rates, should be treated the same as anyone who has something to sell. Let them show us. The farmers did not start this. The idea did not originate with them. It is the other fellow's idea. It is well known that the farmers never thought of a Government price for wheat. The idea originated with others. They whispered to the farmers that it would be a good thing and they took the bait.

PLAUSIBLE GENTLEMEN.

"'Now we are asked by some very plausible gentlemen to support the Plumb plan for Government ownership of railways upon the assurance it will be a great thing for us. This is very generous, very generous, indeed, but I want none of it in mine, and will vote for none of it. Senator LENROOT's plan for a broad Government control with some changes would, to my mind, be much better.

MINE WORKERS HOT AFTER IT.

"'The Plumb plan, as applied to railroads, is to be only part of a general plan for the Government ownership of other industries. The United Mine Workers of America want it; that is to say, the Government to buy the mines and turn the management over to them. In advance of this they are now threatening to strike if they are not granted a six-hour day and a five-day week, plus a 60 per cent increase in wages, and time and a half for overtime.

WHERE WILL THE FARMERS GET OFF?

"'If they demand this now, what will they take for themselves when they gain complete control of the industry through the Plumb plan? Will this make coal cheaper? Or any article where coal is used in its manufacture? Or will it be possible to secure any labor for the farm against such competition?

EVERYBODY DOING IT.

"'Radicals among the miners of gold, silver, copper, etc., are also agitating for the Plumb plan to be applied to their industries, and it is believed that it will also be the next move by the steel organizers. If the Plumb plan is logical and proper for one industry, it is the right of all who work in other industries. There should be no favoritism.

ATTRACTIVELY CAMOUFLAGED.

"'These propositions are always put up in very attractive, inviting packages. I see by some of the North Dakota papers that the saving in freight costs claimed for farmers is to be brought about by squeezing the water out of the railroad stocks. They say that instead of paying interest upon nineteen billions of bonds and stocks the railroads can be taken over for twelve billions. That is the bait by which it is expected to capture farmers' votes. As Maj. Edwards, a pioneer newspaper man, used to say, "important if true."

COURTS MUST TREAT RAILWAY'S PROPERTY SAME AS FARMERS.

"'Mr. Plumb is quoted as saying dramatically, "We will not pay a cent for the railways above what they actually cost!" There may be considerable sympathy with that declaration, but this is a business proposition and it will do no good to turn our faces from the facts. No matter what Mr. Plumb and others like him assert, the courts will apply the same rules of law in respect to taking property from a railway company as when taking it from a private individual. If the State needs a farm for a packing plant or otherwise it can not by condemnation proceedings take it for its original cost, which might have been only a few dollars paid to the Government as homestead fees. If the Government buys the railways they must, according to law, be paid for according to their value at the time they are taken over. It won't be a question of what they cost, but their value measured by present scales of wages and present costs of materials and equipment. The Interstate Commerce Commission will soon complete an exhaustive inventory of the railway property of the Nation, in which will be counted every steel rail, every tie, every yard of earth moved, and all other property scheduled with the same detail, and from which a valuation can be easily figured. Measured by the present scale of wages and cost of materials, the railways are now worth more than $20,000,000,000, according to conservative estimates; in other words, more than the amount of the present issues of bonds and stocks. These are unpleasant facts, but they must be faced if a proper solution of the railway problems is to be obtained.

STOCK ISSUES UNDER RIGID GOVERNMENT CONTROL.

"'Again, the very just complaint about the issuance of watered stocks in the past has no more relevancy to the Plumb plan than to any other plan, because the committees of both the Senate and House have determined, no matter what plan is adopted, to place the railway issues of stocks and bonds under rigid governmental control.

"'Then they say they are going to save money by paying a lower rate of interest. With immense issues of national bonds for the war, for railroads, for coal mines, for other mines, etc., can the Government borrow the money at anything like the present rates? It is highly improbable that there will be much saved in that direction.

WHEN ALL MEN LEAVE THE FARM FOR BIG TOWN WAGES, WHO WILL FEED THEM?

"'My belief is that even the railway men themselves, if they consider where it may finally lead to, can not afford to give up their old leadership and their old methods under which they have made great progress to follow Plumb, the radicalist.'"

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the House and the country on the presentation of this legislation. We have been talking about the reform of our system of estimates and appropriations for a great many years. For one reason and another we have never reached a situation where it seemed possible to start in the direction of the reform that we all favor until this session of Congress.

I want to congratulate the committee that drafted this bill on having arrived at a unanimous conclusion in regard to it. I hope we may go all the way through with budget legislation without any serious division and without any division at all between the two sides of the House. There is certainly no politics in a measure of this kind. It is a matter of practical governmental business and it is important that we should approach it, consider it, and pass upon it without partisan or political bias.

I am one of those who do not consider a radical change in the rules of the House as absolutely essential to the carrying out of a complete and satisfactory budget system. [Applause.] I do not say that it would not be wise to do that, but I am not sure that it would be. It is a very important question and one to which at the proper time we shall give due and proper consideration.

Gentlemen have suggested, as they have stated it, that as we are reforming the executive departments we should reform our own methods. I do not look upon budget legislation as an act of reformation by Congress pressed upon the Executive. I trust there will be no objection in any executive quarter to any proper legislation that we may place on the statute books on this subject. We have never had legislation that clearly defined and definitely guided the executive departments in the preparation of estimates and their presentation to the House, and therefore we have fallen into the unbusinesslike methods that we have followed so long.

In my opinion the most important part of this bill is that portion of it which provides for the new accounting department. I said in my statement before the committee that I thought we would do very well if we took no further step at the beginning than the one contemplated in that action. I am glad, however, the committee saw fit to go further. It is tremendously important that we shall have an independent audit and a body of trained experts who, keeping track of expenditures and informed as to estimates, will be able to so intelligently inform Congress that the evils of a loose system of estimating and appropriating will be so clearly presented to Congress and the country that further reforms will come as a matter of course, because its necessity will be so clearly indicated.

There is nothing in the bill to my mind so tremendously important as this independent audit and the body of intelligent experts who should be brought together and trained under that organization.

After the House and the Senate have determined what we have to do in the matter of budget legislation, then we can take up the question as to whether we shall have one or many committees, and I am still in a position to be persuaded either way, after hearing all of the arguments, as the weight of the arguments may determine. I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] that there are difficulties in the way of a single committee, and yet in the course of time those difficulties might be overcome, and it is possible that we would secure the best results in that way. However, very excellent results could undoubtedly be secured with a greater number of appropriating committees than one. If we were to carry this matter of the budget to its final logical conclusion, we would unite the appropriation committees and the Ways and Means Committee all in one. Nobody has suggested that, however, as all agree that the burden would be too great for one committee, and yet that is the point to which the extreme development of the logic of a budget system will carry you if you propose what some have suggested as a perfect system.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What does the gentleman think of creating a larger committee, not an appropriating committee in fact, which would limit and allocate and apportion the amount which might be appropriated by some of the committees now, and thereby fix a limit on the amount which might be expended by the several committees—though perhaps the gentleman has not given that phase of the matter any consideration.

Mr. MONDELL. Undoubtedly, if we retain as many appropriating committees as now, or more than one appropriating committee, it would be necessary to have some provision whereby the committees would be, to a certain extent at least, under the direction of the House in the total amount of their appropriations. The gentleman suggests a committee that would allocate as between the different committees. Some such system could perhaps be worked out, and it is entirely possible that when we reach that phase of the matter we may find that at the beginning, at least, the best solution will not be a single appropriating committee, but some compromise between the present system and that suggested in the resolution that has been reported. My mind is entirely open to argument.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I mentioned this matter because it was proposed, at least in part, by a bill which I had introduced and which I discussed at some length in the hearings before the committee. The committee did not see fit, however, to adopt the provisions of the bill because of the practical difficulty that interfered with part of it.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to emphasize one fact in connection with this budget legislation, and that is that budget legislation is not necessary primarily, because the Congress by its acts or through legislation or appropriations that it initiates is entirely or principally responsible for the tremendously increasing expenditures of Government; quite the contrary. If this may properly be called a measure to reform the executive departments in the matter of estimates, there is abundant reason for doing that, because while I do not know that anyone has taken the trouble to estimate the difference between the estimates and the appropriations in the last 10 or 20 years, or for any given period, yet we all know that those estimates enormously exceeded the appropriations actually made.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. It was brought out in the hearings that in the 20 years preceding the war Congress had appropriated $595,000,000 less than the administrative estimates.

Mr. MONDELL. All of which emphasizes the statement which I have just made that a budget system is not necessary wholly or primarily for the purpose of restraining the disposition of Congress to appropriate extravagantly, for if we had appropriated what the departments asked us to in years past, the national debt would be very much greater or the tax rates would have been heavier during all of those years. The fact is that the constant growth of appropriations is due in the main to the desire of bureaus and departments to increase their activities, to expand and grow and cover new territory, and do more and spend more in the territory already covered. It is not due, except in a very limited way, to appropriations initiated by the Congress.

To illustrate, right now the officers of the Navy are appearing before the Naval Committees of both House and Senate urging an increase in the pay of the Navy, which, as I understand it, would amount to $135,000,000 per annum. An increase in the pay of the Regular Army has also been asked, and while that increase would not amount to so much as the proposed increase in the Navy, it would amount to many million dollars. These increases are being urged now by the departments. I am not surprised that officers of the Navy and the Army desire increases of pay. We all realize that it must be very difficult for those gentlemen to meet their obligations and to live decently on the same pay that they received before the beginning of the war. However, most of them have advanced a grade or two since that time so that so far as the individual is concerned they are actually receiving a little more than they did at the beginning of the war. In that connection we should be reminded of the fact that up to this time no civil employee of the Government receiving more than $2,500 base pay has had his or her salary increased since the beginning of the war, except as that they have been advanced in grade. My opinion is that we are not likely to increase the pay of the officers of the Army and the Navy until at least we shall have concluded that it is not only wise but essential that we shall increase the pay of at least some of the civil employees of the Government receiving over $2,500.

It is not to be wondered at, perhaps, that these gentlemen are seeking an increase of pay at this time when men in the trades and in certain lines of industry who do not require any considerable amount of preparation, any special education to prepare them for their work, are in some instances getting more pay than those who had given six or eight years of their lives to educational preparation, and who have tremendous responsibilities resting upon them. We are witnessing an extraordinary exhibition of demands in this regard upon the part of the bituminous coal miners, who received perhaps the earliest advance of wages at the beginning of the war, and perhaps as great an advance as anyone. They are now asking not only for a five-day week but time and a half or double pay for overtime and holidays and a 60 per cent increase in wages—demands which, if met, would, it is claimed, make coal a luxury to be enjoyed only by the rich and make it difficult for us to compete with foreigners in the production of manufactured goods. In days when demands as extraordinary as that are made it is not to be wondered at that the men in the military service and in the civil service of the Government ask to have an increase in their pay.

The President has well said that this is a time when men should possess their souls in patience and stop rocking the boat with demands for increases of pay, which are likely to have the effect of again starting prices skyrocketing. It is true that many of those who receive their pay from the Government, both in military and civil life, are receiving no more now than before we entered the war, while most of the men in the trades and industries who are asking for further increases and shorter hours have had their pay largely increased, but, nevertheless, while their cases appeal to us we must guard against large increases of appropriations, even as the President urged that this was the time to try to hold prices level and endeavor to reduce them, free from the disturbing effect of continual increase, which tend to produce the very evil they seek to cure—relief from advancing living costs.

Just what effect a budget system will have on the demand for anywhere from a billion and a half to three billion in the form of bonuses on top of two and a half billions of floating indebtedness we now owe I do not know, but if it will have any restraining effect upon ambitious designs of that sort proposing an enormous additional burden upon the country I think it will accomplish a most excellent purpose. The American people have long sought an improvement of our system of estimates and appropriations. A great many people of this country have urged a budget system, and I congratulate them, and I congratulate the Congress that we are starting in that direction and are about to pass legislation that eventually will give us we hope a perfect or at least a much better system. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield back his time?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back five minutes of his time.

Mr. PURNELL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, how much time did I yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Connecticut begins, might I have one minute of the time which I yielded back? I simply desire to call attention to the fact that there are now in the gallery looking down on this assembly of the representatives of the American people some new Americans, some fine stalwart young gentlemen, who come to us from some 15 different countries beyond the seas. [Applause.] They come here to be of our citizenship, and they have given evidence of their good intentions by putting on the uniform, and in four months these young men, coming here ignorant of our language, have learned to read and speak English and to drill as finely as the best soldiers under any flag. [Applause.] We not only had the pleasure of witnessing these young gentlemen drill, but of conversing with a number of them, and they speak English well and seem to understand it perfectly. I want to congratulate them and especially to congratulate the officers who have trained them. [Applause.] I want to congratulate the men who have taken an interest in this splendid work. It is a work of which we may all be proud. We appreciate these stalwart additions to our citizenship, and hope that after these young soldiers have served the period of their enlistment they will find abundant opportunity as citizens here in the land of the free. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for one minute.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I had asked the one minute of time for the purpose of doing what the majority leader has just done, calling attention to our guests in the gallery. Although this pleasant task has been so gracefully performed by my friend from Wyoming, nevertheless I shall avail myself of the minute that has been granted me to add just a word. This detachment of recent Army recruits under the direction of Col. Bernard Lentz, of the General Staff of the Army, have been making a tour of the country to demonstrate that the Army has created a "melting pot" that actually melts. The detachment is popularly known by the appropriate title and designation of "Americans all." They are accompanied by Chaplain Fell, who has also done a great deal for them in this work. They represent, as the gentleman from Wyoming has said, 14 different nationalities, but now "Americans all." Four months ago they could not write or read the English language. They have been taught English and trained at the same time. Anyone who witnessed the drill on the Plaza at the east front of the Capitol this morning and understood its full meaning will appreciate what has been done, is being done, and will continue to be done in this great American melting pot of the United States Army. [Applause.] I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a roster of this detachment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. In accordance with the permission just granted, I here insert a complete roster of the "Americans all" detachment from the recruit educational center—the Army melting pot—Camp Upton, N. Y.

The roster is as follows:

"AMERICANS ALL."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS]. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, everyone does and should appreciate the necessity for the most rigid economy. It should be practiced in our public as well as private affairs. The enormous expenditures made during the war, now happily over, very greatly increased the public debt, the interest upon which will make our annual expenditures very much larger during the present generation. For this reason it is necessary for us to reduce expenses in every possible way consistent with the efficient management of our Government. The high cost of living has impressed each individual and family with the necessity of reducing their personal expenses. Therefore economy in public and private affairs will be very greatly emphasized in the years immediately before us.

The bill under discussion to-day, if enacted into law, will provide a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts. I favor it because it will cause a closer scrutiny of every item that goes into an appropriation bill, and after the funds are made available the expenditures will be more closely examined and criticized. I believe that it will result in reducing the expenses of the Nation and reduce taxation. Such a measure has been under discussion for a number of years. It was ably advocated by Hon. John J. Fitzgerald, former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and Hon. Swagar Sherley, who followed him as chairman of that great committee. An amendment was added to the sundry civil bill during the closing hours of the Sixty-fifth Congress providing for a commission to study this subject and report a suitable bill. It was defeated on account of the filibuster in the Senate. The report of the committee on the pending bill is unanimous. It had before it a number of men who have given much study to the question, and the members of the committee are to be congratulated upon the information furnished the House in general debate upon the bill.

The bill provides for the creation of a Bureau of the Budget in the office of the President, with a director and an assistant director in charge. The bureau will be charged with the duty of making a careful investigation of all estimates of the official needs in detail of every department and bureau of the Government for the next fiscal year. A report will be made by it to the President, who is required to transmit the same to Congress. The budget is required to contain a balanced statement of the revenues and expenditures of the Government for the preceding fiscal year and of the resources and liabilities of the Treasury at the close of the year and estimates of the revenues and expenditures of the Government for the current fiscal year, as well as how these needs must be met.

An accounting department is created, headed by a comptroller general, with an assistant comptroller general, who shall hold office during good behavior and be removable only by a concurrent resolution of Congress. The comptroller general is charged with the responsibility of auditing every expenditure made by the various departments and bureaus and is required to make a report in writing annually, making such suggestions as to changes in legislation thought desirable and giving such information as may be helpful to Congress. In this way the advocates of the system hope to focus public attention upon every item of extravagance and eliminate the same and consolidate bureaus that are doing the same general character of work, thereby avoiding duplication. With the bureau independent of all departments it is expected that the head of every bureau or department submitting an item to be included in the budget will be required to fully justify it.

The budget system as presented does not take away from Congress the constitutional power of making appropriations. The budget submitted each year may be added to or reduced. While I believe the system will result in a great saving to the Government and will prevent the creation of new bureaus and result in the elimination of much duplication of work, it is too much to hope, without additional or further legislation, that all extravagances will be avoided.

I want to call attention to the advisability of a constitutional amendment empowering the President of the United States to veto any item in an appropriation bill. Many of the new States, including my own, have provisions of this kind in their constitutions, and most of the older States that have revised their constitutions within the last few years have incorporated a like provision in them. For this purpose I have prepared the following amendment:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States, as provided by the Constitution:

Amend section 1, Article VII, of the Constitution of the United States by adding the following paragraph at the end of said section:

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate making appropriations of money embracing distinct items, shall before it becomes a law be presented to the President of the United States; if he approves, he shall sign it, but if he disapproves the bill or any item or appropriations therein contained, he shall communicate such disapproval with his reasons therefor to the House in which the bill shall have originated. All items not disapproved shall have the force and effect of law according to the original provision of the bill. Any item or items so disapproved shall be void, unless repassed by a two-thirds vote, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in section 7, Article I, in reference to other bills."

In my judgment, the adoption of this amendment would be a long step in the right direction to enable the President to check extravagance in appropriations. Many doubtful items in the closing hours of Congress find their way upon general appropriation bills and can not be eliminated without vetoing the entire bill and necessitating the reconvening of Congress. No President would want to take the responsibility of doing this. There is no reason why the President should not be given the authority to veto any separate item or veto any separate piece of legislation on appropriation bills. If such authority were given him, the vicious practice of placing legislative riders on appropriation bills would be stopped.

The various departments under the system proposed would have to submit their estimates through the director of the budget and the President to Congress, and the committees of Congress would have the advantage of estimates carefully gone over and justified, in the first place, and, in addition, would have them further examined and explained before them. This would give Congress more information regarding the appropriations, which would enable their being reduced. If Congress attempted to increase the appropriations above the requirements of the various departments, it could be checked by the President's veto.

An erroneous impression prevails throughout the country that Congress alone is responsible for large appropriations. In the past 20 years Congress has reduced appropriations below the estimates furnished through the Treasury Department more than $500,000,000, as the following table shows:

Comparative statement exhibiting, for the 20-year period covering the fiscal years 1897 to 1916, inclusive, the grand total of estimates submitted by the Executive and the grand total of appropriations granted by the Congress.

Net excess of estimates			555,620,614.67

[1] The appropriations for 1903 include the sum of $50,130,000 for the Panama Canal, an amount not submitted in the estimates for that fiscal year. If that amount be eliminated, the excess of estimates would be $25,853,821.92.

The present law requires estimates of the various departments to be submitted through the Treasury Department. This has been done, but the estimates have been in a large volume and have not been carefully digested and have not been balanced with our revenues. Under the existing law it is required—of the heads of the several executive departments, and of such other officers authorized or required to make estimates, to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before the 15th day of October of each year, their annual estimates for the public service, to be included in the Book of Estimates prepared by law under his direction, and in case of failure to furnish estimates as herein required it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be prepared in the Treasury Department, on or before the 1st day of November of each year, estimates for such appropriations as, in his judgment, shall be requisite in every such case, which estimates shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared by law under his direction for the consideration of Congress. (Mar. 3, 1901, Stat. L., vol. 31, p. 1009, sec. 5.)

The statutes further provide that—

All annual estimates for the public service shall be submitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be included in the Book of Estimates prepared under his direction. (R. S., sec. 3669.)

The statutes further provide—

All estimates of appropriations and estimates of deficiencies in appropriations intended for the consideration and seeking the action of any of the committees of Congress shall be transmitted to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, and in no other manner; and the said Secretary shall first cause the same to be properly classified, compiled, indexed, and printed, under the supervision of the chief of the division of bookkeeping and warrants of his department. (July 7, 1884, Stat. L., vol. 23, p. 254, sec. 2.)

The act of March 4, 1909, provides that—

Immediately upon the receipt of the regular annual estimates of appropriations needed for the various branches of the Government it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to estimate as nearly as may be the revenues of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year, and if the estimates for appropriations, including the estimated amount necessary to meet all continuing and permanent appropriations, shall exceed the estimated revenues the Secretary of the Treasury shall transmit the estimates to Congress as heretofore required by law and at once transmit a detailed statement of all of said estimates to the President, to the end that he may, in giving Congress information of the state of the Union and in recommending to their consideration such measures as he may judge necessary, advise the Congress now in his judgment the estimated appropriation could with least injury to the public service be reduced so as to bring the appropriations within the estimated revenues, or, if such reduction be not in his judgment practicable without undue injury to the public service, that he may recommend to Congress such loans or new taxes as may be necessary to cover the deficiencies. (Mar. 4, 1909, Stat. L., vol. 35, p. 1027, sec. 7.)

It was intended by this legislation to make the Treasury Department a bureau of the budget, but the Treasury Department has a very large number of other bureaus, and it has been thought advisable by most economists that the bureau of the budget be separated from and made entirely independent of all other departments of the Government.

Many of the States, including my own, have enacted legislation of this kind. I am sure that much more attention will be given to the subject by the legislatures of the various States in the years immediately ahead of us than has been given in the past. There is the same necessity for strict economy in the expenditure of public funds appropriated by State legislatures and by municipalities as confronts the Federal Government. With the increased burden of direct taxation—local, State, and National—retrenchment in expenditures will be insisted upon.

It is interesting to follow the increase in appropriations. When our Constitution was ratified we had a population of about 3,500,000, while we now have a population of approximately 110,000,000. When Washington was inaugurated he was allowed a Cabinet composed of a Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Attorney General, and Postmaster General. The Navy Department was created by the act of April 30, 1798. The Department of the Interior was established by the act of March 3, 1849. While there had been an Attorney General from the beginning of the Government, the Department of Justice was created by the act of June 22, 1870. The Department of Agriculture was created by the act of February 9, 1889, although there had been a Commissioner of Agriculture created by the act of May 15, 1862. The Department of Commerce and Labor was established by the act of February 14, 1903, and was separated into two departments by the act of March 4, 1913. With the establishment of each department, new bureaus were created and their work expanded, very much enlarging the activities of the Government.
